Picture–but no story

The Grantham and Thorpe Show in Tameside once again attracted packed audiences last week. Mr Colin Grantham, leader of the council, declared—in the heat of debate, it is now claimed—that any teacher would be sacked on the spot for refusing to hang the £29 jubilee portrait of the Queen in a suitably prominent place in school or for removing it once hung. Outrage all round: allegations of rampant republicanism: loud applause for Mr Grantham's stance from the Any Questions team: sharp reminders of the employment protection legislation from the National Association of Head Teachers: overtime put in by the education committee chairman, Mr Donald Thorpe, to get his colleague to consent to a more moderately worded resolution for the council meeting on May 2.

Mischievous observers who were looking forward to the prospect of Tameside arraigned before an industrial tribunal for acting "unreasonably" (using, of course, the Law Lords definition of the term as handed down in the case of Mulley v Tameside) in sacking teachers for such an offence will be sadly disappointed with Mr Thorpe's apparent success.

Consolation

However, consolation for Messrs Grantham and Thorpe's political opponents: the antics at home in Tameside kept the authority's representative away from last week's meeting of the Association of Metropolitan Authorities education committee and thereby ensured that Labour kept control of the chairmanship. Mrs Nicki Harrison, chairman of Haringey's education committee, was elected by 18 votes to 17. She was formerly the vice-chairman.

Mr Peter Horton, chairman of Sheffield's education committee, stood down to become the new vice-chairman. This is another story in itself and the Labour group is being tight-lipped about it. But it seems there has been much resentment in the group at what might be loosely called the South Yorkshire mafia at the AMA.

The tidy and tactful answer was for Horton and Harrison to do a swop. But it remains to be seen how long Mrs Harrison will last. If she wins her seat in the May elections in Haringey she will probably have to withstand a determined Tory fight to change AMA rules.

The Conservatives are likely to have a majority in the education committee after the election. And the Tories have already said they wil change the system whereby the chairman is elected just before the local elections.

So the redoubtable Mrs Harrison may find herself kicked out of the chair after May 5. She will be a tough lady to shift but democracy rules—O.K.

Last ditch?

Such is the determination of certain parents in Sheffield to save their sons—something over 100 of them—from the local comprehensives that they stumped up some £10,000 of loan capital at a meeting last week in an attempt to save the Independent Grammar School.

The school opened in September, a private company, selling a grammar school education to some 120 boys aged from four to 16 for between £480 and £780 a year. The sales value of the school was much enhanced by a court of distinguished persons whose names appeared on the initial prospectus—Peter Mason, of Manchester Grammar School, the Earl of Scarborough, and four people on the faculty of Sheffield University.

Come the turn of the year the school began somewhat spectacularly to fall apart (TES, February 10) and all but one of the distinguished court resigned. The terms on which staff were employed and the school's financial status were the main bones of contention.

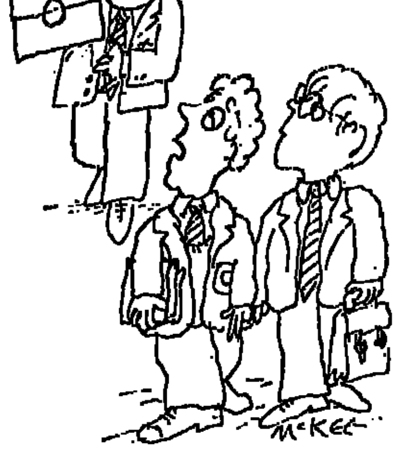
Now comes the announcement this week that the directors of the school, sole shareholders of the private company, have "stepped down" to make way for a new board.

This board is chaired by the one member of the previous court who stuck by the directors in January and did not resign, Dr E. R. Buckle, lecturer in metallurgy. The rest of the new board is made up mainly of parents elected at last week's meeting. It also includes one other member of the old court, Dr Peter Smith, whose son was at the school, but is now at the local comprehensive.

The new board's task is to negotiate with the outgoing directors for the shares in the company, to discover exactly what the school's financial position is, and to look at the academic side. The school was always under-capitalized and they will be trying to see whether a relatively small group of parents can sustain a private school on a charitable basis with smallish premises and a very favourable pupil/teacher ratio.

Tomorrow the academic subgroup of the new board, headed by Dr Smith, are off to Manchester to see if they can persuade Peter Mason to rejoin the enterprise. It has not escaped their notice that come September, Mr Mason will himself have retired.

Their cup would I suspect be filled with joy if he would only come and lend a hand. Certainly, his initial involvement was due to his belief that Sheffield stood in real need of an independent school. And a lot of other people's involvement was due to the pulling power of his name—including Dr Smith's.



"Guess what we're doing in economics."

Cambridge goes comprehensive

For the first time ever, the Cambridge University Union, still a major forcing house for future political leaders, has a president who is a former comprehensive school pupil.

Twenty-one-year-old Robert Harris, a final year student reading English at Selwyn, attended the 1,500-strong King Edward VII Upper School, Melton Mowbray, and has nothing but praise for the system as he knew it. "My headmaster told me when I left I was getting the best education England had to offer, going to a comprehensive school and then on to Cambridge and I'm inclined to agree with him. The school had good teachers, excellent facilities and gave me every encouragement in developing my political interests."

He is taking over at a time when the union, he feels, has a mood of new seriousness, a harder political profile. He points out that he is the first Labour Party member to be president for more than four years and faces a controversial term of office, including a debate on the motion "This House deplores the closed shop", proposed by George Ward, of Grunwick fame, and opposed by Owen O'Brien of NATSOPA.

Sound without the fury

Is the Association for the Study of the Curriculum as important as it sounds? Its second annual conference held in Brighton last week did little to establish it as any sort of guiding light for those adrift in the stormy curriculum debate.

The main speakers were all illuminating enough, in a "look at life" sense, but generally what they had to say barely made passing reference to current curriculum issues. More than one delegate was heard to mutter about "jobs for the boys" at the preponderance of the organizers' Sussex University cronies on the programme.

Ronald Dore, from the university's Institute of Development Studies perambulated his experiences of Third World societies where education is even more a question of proving rather than improving yourself.

Chris Freeman, from Sussex's Science Policy Research Unit, gave a prodigious rendering of the five million - unemployed - by - the 1980s thesis, and Dr Tom Whiston from the same unit opined that 500,000 extra teachers would help.

Admittedly, the theme of the conference, "Curriculum and the needs of Society" was one of those portmanteaus that it would be hard to throw anything out of as irrelevant, but the ASC does seem to have wandered from the point a bit. Hardly a whisper was heard about the Green Paper, the common core or the recent Curriculum 11 to 16 gospel according to HMIs, all of which purported to be about matching what is taught in schools to what society needs.

Accountability, which Sussex has made a big thing of, and the Taylor report got a going over in discussion groups, but more in a manner befitting the association's first conference last year, "Power and the curriculum".

So has the ASC gone astray, or at least been lead there temporarily? Or is it the common core, the Government's Green Paper ideas and the outpourings of HMIs that are not as important as they sound?

Fly away Peter–come back Paul

Small magazines come and go. In these hard publishing times rather more go than come. Society Today, which in its brief flowering built up a circulation of 8,500 among older school sociology students, has now gone to the wall—at least in its present form.

For two years it enjoyed a close but in many ways independent relationship with its parent magazine New Society, offering its pages for open discussion of such things as the content of examination papers and whether sociologists can be truly objective. Issues concentrated on single themes—knowledge, interaction, employment—and a long-running discussion on the problem facing the children of West Indian migrants culminated in a summer debate at Vauxhall Manor School with the professionals facing the comments and criticisms of the children under discussion.

But the magazine, originally a product of New Society's concern that, unlike its stablemate New Scientist, it did not sell well in schools, proved unable to cover necessary cost and the last issue comes out on April 21.

It will reappear as a regular pull-out insert into New Society. But editor Patricia Holland will be stepping down from her seat, fearing that much of what made Society Today what it was will be lost. Gone, she feels, will be the flexibility, scope, and above all the style and presentation; gone will be cartoon characters like Supersociologists, possibly to be replaced by uninviting columns of grey type.

Fast gallop into a silly trap

Teachers who have seen the Lloyds Bank advertisement on television (a silhouetted black horse gallops along a beach, cut to bank and details of Lloyds' new Black Horse guides) could be forgiven for not realizing how involved schools are soon to be in this "heavyweight" (Lloyds' word) campaign to educate the masses about money and, incidentally, about Lloyds.

This summer 3,000 schools will be offered free copies of one of the guides, When you start earning, and branch managers may already have got in contact with head teachers explaining the project and asking for an order. The guides—the three others are Household and family money management; Tax and financial planning and Questions women ask about money (more about this later)—will also be made available in banks, citizens' advice bureaux and community centres.

The idea is simple enough. When you start earning, for example, asks and answers questions like "What will my pay slip show me?" and "How do I open a bank account?" In fact so simple is the idea that it is hard to grasp what all the fuss is about. Have not banks been publishing leaflets and booklets on these lines for a long time, and if not why not?

It is a pity, therefore, that Lloyds appear to have fallen into a silly trap, which in many ways casts doubt upon the whole exercise. Why call one of the booklets Questions women ask about money. Do not women also want to know about tax and financial planning and household and family money management?

Perhaps they should complete the set with Question men ask about household and family money.

FUN WITH MULTIPLES OF 12

A group of children experimenting with the multiplication table for 12 found in it two numbers 48 and 84, in which the sum of the digits 4 + 8, was also 12. When they found that 12 × 13 = 156, and 1 + 5 + 6 = 12, and 12 × 16 = 192, and 1 + 9 + 2 = 12, they began to make a list of multiples of 12, whose three digits had a sum of 12. Apart from the obvious ones, 480 and 840, they found several others: can you find them all?

When they looked at the complete list of such numbers, they noticed that in six cases the first two digits were the same, and that in every other case the difference between the first two digits was either 4 or 8: for example, the number 156 showed a difference of 4 between 1 and 5, and the number 192 showed a difference of 8 between 1 and 9. As they could not see why this should be so, they asked their teacher to explain why. Could you explain why?

Off the streets and into the clubs and schools

Political education again: this time money for youth organizations for training in politics and, at a different level, more evidence of the stress to the system caused by political campaigning by extreme groups whose main claim to attention is the relish with which they offend all decent notions of behaviour.

As to the first—the hand-out of funds to the National Association of Youth Clubs and the British Youth Council, to promote the political education of club members—this seems a good example of the old truth that no kind of public expenditure is too balmy to gain support in a period of acute financial stringency. For once, the egregious Dr Boyson hit the nail on the head. This is an absurd waste of money. It is also based on a grotesque misunderstanding of the causes of present-day political apathy.

There is the added nonsense that the lion's share of the money is to go to the British Youth Council which, whatever its virtues, is the wrong agency for the purpose. It is an apparatus for already aspiring young politicians, provisioned by the Foreign Office, to provide a British youth presence at international conferences. If there is deemed to be a need for this project (which is extremely doubtful) then there must be a more appropriate claimant for the cash than the BYC.

There can, on the other hand, be no doubt that the activities of the National Front in racially-sensitive constituencies is putting severe strain on the long-standing practice of making schools available for public meetings at election times. The events in Brixton last weekend, which led to 34 arrests, raised various points of detail about the application of the present laws.

The ILEA was obliged to give permission for the meeting to be held, provided it was open to the public. It is now alleged that it was only public in the limited sense that a member of the National Front selected a small number from the crowd outside the building excluding anyone known to be hostile, and that this small public group was then shown into a hall already largely filled by NF supporters.

Sir Ashley Bramall, leader of the ILEA, is collecting evidence on whether it was a public meeting within the meaning of the Act. If permission were to be withheld in future, leaders of the National Front would presumably have to apply to the courts if they wanted to force the ILEA to change its mind.

Legal niceties apart, a number of important public issues remain. Schools are community institutions. They ought to be available for community purposes. And if politics is a worthy form of activity, why should not schools continue to be used for public meetings? Yet the complaint is that nobody turns out for meetings. That one party which is legally entitled to campaign happens to have such controversial policies that it attracts big and hostile crowds is hardly a reason for scrapping the sensible idea that public buildings exist for public use at election time.

School's out: National Front members escort their chairman, John Tyndall, from Loughborough Infants School, Brixton, after last weekend's clashes.

To this there are two counter arguments. The first, which deserves to be treated with extreme caution, is that the National Front is so nasty that while all other legal political parties should be allowed to use the schools for public meetings, the NF should be refused permission to do so. Alternatively all parties should be excluded because of the obnoxious characteristics of one.

Even those with nothing good to say for the National Front must be disposed to question the wisdom of placing them beyond the political pale. It is because the National Front contests elections that everybody can see that they seldom attract more than a tiny proportion of voters. National Front activists would seem more menacing if there were not repeated evidence that most citizens shun them at the polls.

The second argument has more substance. It is that the schools have a hard enough job to do at the best of times in places like Brixton. The use of schools for controversial political meetings can stir up emotions and cause physical damage which interferes with the smooth running of the school. And the publicity heightens racial tension among the communities the school serves. Moreover, some unsophisticated parents may conclude that because a meeting occurs at a school it enjoys some official blessing and this, too, could damage community relations. Many of the teachers who demonstrated peacefully outside the recent NF meeting (and were largely ignored by the press) felt this strongly and based their opposition to allowing the school to be used for political purposes on pragmatic grounds such as these.

Mrs Shirley Williams has let it be known that she thinks the law should be reconsidered in the light of present circumstances. Responsibility for any review rests with the Home Secretary and some sort of an internal inquiry is likely.

On balance it is difficult to see any grounds for stopping the use of schools for public meetings: if anything, they should be made more not less accessible to the community as a whole. And if politics—including the nasty side of politics as a reflection of social conflict—is central to community life in a democracy, it would be a serious error to invent spurious reasons for freezing out whichever political party seems to have fewest friends. If there is to be any curtailment of present rights, it should be based on specific considerations, such as the likely damage to the fabric of the building, rather than on a more general and often patronising desire to protect a naive electorate from provocation or offence.

Fences to mend

Time is running out on Mrs Shirley Williams and the leaders of the Association of University Teachers. The AUT is due to meet in council on May 17 to decide whether its threatened action in support of its salary claim is to go ahead. If it decides that it is, then a minority of university teachers will refuse to mark final examination papers and this will throw the annual examination ritual into chaos.

The Government bears a great deal of blame for the present deadlock. At the time (in 1974) when it was decided to bring the chopper down on the university teachers and prevent them from getting the rise which they had been awarded at arbitration, the Government seemed to take a malicious delight in bullying a weak group of salary-earners. It made a change from being pushed around by every union with muscle. Being publicly unfair to the university teachers and resisting their legitimate arguments became a useful way of advertising the Government's commitment to a wages policy and their determination to stick to it, no matter what anomalies cropped up.

The university teachers have lately even had to watch the National Union of Teachers squeeze more than the odds out of the Government by calculated aggression. If the AUT now feels frustrated, it is easy to see why and who is to blame.

But this does not mean that it will be anything but a disaster if the refusal to mark papers goes ahead. For the reasons Professor Kogan advanced on this page four weeks ago, it would split the university teachers down the middle and do lasting damage to their professional reputation. It would breach the trust which ought to [illegible] and lead to still more frustration and bitterness.

At the eleventh hour, the onus is clearly on the Government to try to negotiate its way out of the deadlock. Mrs Williams's Parliamentary answer on March 23 already represents a major step forward. "The Government recognize", she said, "that because of the timing of pay policy, university teachers have suffered a wholly exceptional anomaly since October, 1974. This has now been quantified and agreed by the Government. In recognition of the three years that have elapsed since the arbitration board's intentions were frustrated, there is a Government assurance that this unique anomaly, which the agreed scales would correct, will be rectified over not more than the next three academic years—that is 1978-79 to 1980-81 . . ."

This is a firm guarantee (not just a promise to make a start as a correspondent suggested in our letters columns last week) and, if it lacks the particular form of the promise given to the firemen, it is nevertheless quite explicit. (Not like the school teachers' declaration on Houghton.) The AUT insists that up to three years is too long to wait, and wants a big first instalment in October. The Government has not ruled this out but cannot gather its skirts up quickly enough to decide five months before the operative date for the 1978-79 settlement. The immediate focus of attention is on armed forces' pay and the impending report of the doctors' and dentists' review body. It is a truism that the hardest thing to do in pay policy is to disentangle any single claim from all the other claims. As phase three comes to an end this is what Government is clearly trying [illegible] the university teachers could be a necessary early step in this process.

Outlaw and sage

How will posterity judge F. R. Leavis? The question is of interest since no other literary critic in living memory has put past, present and future so relentlessly on trial. Throughout most of his 82 years Leavis waged war on several fronts at once; if none of the enemies have been vanquished, the armies of the faithful have at least prospered and multiplied.

If Leavis is remembered at Cambridge as the academic outlaw driven by a passion which could turn venomous, he will also be revered as the sage. Many of his ex-pupils—those he taught directly and those who simply bathed in his aura—have in their turn been preaching the gospel, whether in classrooms or from the boards of the National Theatre.

Few would nowaday call themselves Leavisites in the original, starkly partisan sense of the word but there is a sense in which, in education at least, we are all Leavisites now. That part of the gospel according to Leavis which deals with the indissolubly reciprocal relationship between literature and life—health in one leading to sanity in the other—has now, thank goodness, become one of the truisms on which good teaching is based.

Leavis's constant concern with the Text itself, rather than with the text as seen through a theoretical or philosophical filter, has brought forth critical fruit in other hands besides his own. If his literary judgment seems at times perverse rather than squarely controversial, this is a small price to pay for his more habitual burning clarity.

Was there a slightly hysterical element in Leavis's hostility to the academic establishment and to the Bloomsbury literary scene, and does this element live on in the work of some of his anti-metropolitan followers? Ungenerously, one might say yes. But this again is surely a petty consideration. We should be grateful for our prophets, and grant them licence, on occasion, to be insufferable.

Time of hope?

This time last year, when the Black Paper '77 was published, the TES reported some anxiety in the DES over figures contained in an article by Mr R. W. Baldwin. These figures appeared to show a decline in the maintained schools as a whole in the percentage of people getting five O levels or CSE grade 1s. The anxiety was the greater because the provisional figures for 1975 which the department had (but Mr Baldwin had not had) showed a further decline. Some 17.84 per cent had got th emagic number of passes in 1974, 17.14 in 1975. Before RSLA intervened in 1973 the numbers had been consistently over 18 per cent for four years.

Checking this week to see what further light could be thrown on this matter by the latest lot of figures published by the DES earlier this month, the answer was interesting—but tentative.

The 1975 figure has now been revised from 17.14 to 19.28 and the 1976 figure now available was 19.73. The trend would seem to have turned upwards. And the figure has now reached a new high.

At the same time the percentage getting one A level in 1976 (12.92) shows a slight rise after an apparent steady fall from a peak in 1971 to 1975. The percentage getting two A levels (10.19) and 3 A levels (6.53) both continue an upward trend which had started in 1974.

However, before anyone rushes to make any claims it must be said that the DES is less than confident about the O level figures. Since the basis of Mr Baldwin's figures is not entirely clear, they cannot be sure that the new provisional ones are on exactly the same basis. What, for example, should be done about people who fail to get a grade at A level but do get an O level?

East is east?

Many Muslim parents, worried by the moral degeneration of Western society, would like their children to be educated separately. MOHAMMED IQBAL looks at how this could best be done

The Sydney Stringer School and Community College, Coventry, has a student body of 1,600, 200 of which are indigenous English pupils, the remainder being Sikhs, Hindus and Muslims from India and Pakistan, and pupils of Irish, Scottish, Polish and Chinese extraction, a truly multiracial school. In the summer of 1976, there were 320 school leavers. By December, 1976, 100 had found jobs or places on training courses, 120 had joined further education courses and 100 were unemployed. Of the employed 80 were white; of those in further education, 100 were Asian; of the unemployed 80 were Asian or West Indian.

The director has recently shown concern at the treatment of coloured school-leavers, and expressed the hope that "Westernization" of the ethnic minority pupils will be the solution. In terms of job opportunities it may. But what about the secularization, irreligiousness, materialism, pseudo-individualism and erosion of moral values which go with it? Leading members of the Muslim community in Britain (one million to 1,500,000 strong) are only too well aware of the heavy price the community will have to pay for economic gains at the cost of their faith, the religion of Islam.

Islamic education in state schools is minimal. Already religious education is relegated to the bottom of the school timetable. What position would it hold if any future Education Act removes the legal requirement? Yet Islamic education means a lot to Muslims, as is apparent from statistical data on religious education in the mosques which I have recently secured from Muslim organizations throughout the country.

In a Yorkshire town nearly 1,000 boys and girls of all age groups are receiving an average of 10 hours evening and weekend tuition in Islam and Arabic every week. This is the pattern which is followed in much the same way in the rest of the country.

Muslim parents are increasingly aware of the moral degeneration of the society through the news media. On a comparatively small scale they see signs of it in their own families when, for example, illegitimate pregnancies occur. And they are afraid that the incidence of such cases in the Muslim community will increase to the same level as in the rest of the [illegible] world has undergone a relaxation in morals until "child sex health clinics" and "single-parent homes" are seen as the answers to adultery and the care of unwanted children, the Islamic law insists on modesty, humility and chastity and marriage at any age after the first menstrual period.

There is a consensus of opinion among the Muslim intelligentsia in the United Kingdom in favour of the propagation of Islam among their children. Their mutual differences, if any, are peripheral; no more significant than the dispute between the little-end and big-end Lilliputians in Jonathan Swift's Gulliver's Travels as to how the egg should be opened. Nor are they divided on differing theological concepts. They all believe in the unity of Allah the Almighty, completely divorced from the Christian Trinity of Godhead, however metaphorical it may be, and in the institution of the finality of Prophethood on the Prophet Muhammad, peace be upon him.

British Muslims realize very well the fact that, because of the lack of qualified Muslim teachers, Islam will have to be taught by non-Muslim religious education teachers, especially in a multi-faith situation, and there is bound to be teaching of Christianity as a predominant element in religious education. They also know that Islamic education can be imparted effectively only in county schools, as the teaching in the mosque is, by and large, carried out by unqualified teachers and in an inadequate fashion. It cannot be denied that Muslim youth do compare the teaching in the mosque and the county school. "Repeat after me" is still in vogue in the mosque.

In 1975 the 120 affiliated active organizations of the Union of Muslim Organizations of the United Kingdom and Eire (UMO) published Islamic Education and Single-Sex Schools, demanding the retention of single-sex schools for Muslim girls. This document aimed at highlighting the principles of Islam to be obeyed in the social behaviour of Muslim men and women (Al-Qur'an 24: 30-31, 33: 32-33 and 5: 48) and hence the need for separate schools for girls and boys. It also aimed to create awareness among the Muslim community of new plans for secondary reorganization. Many of these were being delayed because of cuts in education spending and the end of the single-sex schools in Britain, therefore, seemed not as near as we were led to believe. The then chairman of the former Community Relations Commission, welcomed this research report and advised the community to evaluate statistically their needs for single-sex schools. This they have been doing in some areas where the schools in question are still run separately, but future amalgamation cannot be ruled out.

At the same time, there have been repeated suggestions to the DES and l.e.a.s. that they should cease to maintain denominational schools. This may well be a fair suggestion for economic reasons, but heinous if it results from religious intolerance. This could mean that the only available alternative would be to set up completely independent schools. This would not be easy, though not impossible. Progress on buildings can be slow, and can seem to be the result of lack of understanding by administrators. A Muslim site-foreman of a mosque under construction in the north of England was recently despairing over the delay in getting his plans and constructional progress checked and approved by the technical and engineering service of a local authority. The mosque for the Muslim is a place of worship, a Sunday school for the religious education of children and a community centre. What is not realized by officialdom is the urgency of these projects because the longer Muslim children and adults are exposed to this sort of deprivation, the more there will be disillusionment amongst youths and insecurity amongst adults.

Where it is a question of establishing separate schools, money and sponsors from the muslim community are important. the primary independent school in the place of a state school is not entitled to any funds from the self-help scheme run by the Home Office for supplementary education and training in the evenings and at weekends. Nor would it be eligible for a grant through Section 11 of Local Government Act 1966 and Urban Aid.

Muslim parents in places like London, Birmingham, Bradford and Glasgow are anxiously waiting for such schools to be set up. But for the time being Muslim boys and girls will continue to make best use of what is offered by the state education system, and could continue to do so, if l.e.a.s would follow Holland's example. There the authorities will support a separate school for any religious persuasion, provided a group of 200-300 pupils is offered as clientele.

Since 1974 the working party on Islamic education in the United Kingdom, consisting of representatives from major national Muslim organizations and some academics, has been working to take stock of the various educational anomalies experienced by Muslim children and has recently produced a working document on the setting up of a national Muslim education council and the draft constitution of the proposed council. It is hoped to call in the near future a conference of Muslim educationists in state schools and further education institutes to develop the idea.

The organizations represented on the working party would, as financiers to the council, like to see established single-sex secondary schools opened to pupils of all religious persuasions and, where possible, separate Muslim secondary schools established for girls. Beyond the crucial age of adolescence when young people can be led astray morally, the Muslim girls will, for the time being, join the further education institutes for training for careers such as teaching, medicine, nursing, social work. This would be desirable if, for example, Muslim women would wish to be treated by lady doctors only and Islam children to be taught by Muslim teachers only. Given the understanding that there would be no stigma attached to Muslim girls educated in single-sex schools, and no discrimination practised against the visual and religious differences, there should be equality of job opportunity through open and fair competition.

Finally, it must be pointed out that historically the Muslim community in Britain is not the only minority Muslim community, and examples of migration among followers of Islam to all parts of the world are well known. Islam originated from Saudi Arabia nearly 1,400 years ago. Today the 800 million-strong Muslim population is increasing and flourishing, one of the reasons being that Muslims, in paradoxical situations, as is apparent in the issue of separate schools for Muslim girls and job prospects in a competitive society, have adhered to Islamic principles rather than worldly gains.

Labour faithful complain about Mrs Williams

by Stephen Cohen

Murmuring against Mrs Shirley Williams has grown recently among members of the Labour Party's education sub-committee. As yet there has been no formal decision by the sub-committee, which is due to hold its next regular meeting shortly. But according to one source, senior members of the party have complained to the Prime Minister about her performance as Secretary of State. It is suggested that while she has always been ready to meet the sub-committee, she has ignored their advice.

An influential member of the 30-strong sub-committee said this week that many people in the party thought Mrs Williams was "making a mess of things". Many members of the sub-committee felt that the performance of the Government as a whole had been creditable, but that not much had been done in the education field.

There is said to be a growing feeling of disillusionment within the sub-committee about Mrs Williams. It is thought that she has been too easily led by officials at the Department of Education into making pronouncements from which she has subsequently had to back-track.

The air of despondency has been compounded by her alleged failure to pursue the Labour Party's manifesto policies of promoting nursery schools and revitalizing education for the 16 to 19 age group. This is coupled with increasing disenchantment by Labour-controlled local education authorities which are reluctant to make public their criticisms.

Two major issues are said to have prompted the campaign against Mrs Williams. Last year, she attempted to initiate a discussion aimed at the closure of sixth forms in small and medium sized secondary schools, arguing that they were uneconomic and could not provide the range of subjects pupils might need for a well-balanced sixth form course. The debate eventually petered out after opposition from teachers and local authorities.

The party's education sub-committee was not consulted about the proposal, and it and the eventual climbdown by Mrs Williams are seen as an example of Civil Service manipulation of politicians. If the sub-committee had discussed the idea, she would have been told not to pursue it.

The second example concerns the issue of parental choice of secondary schools which Mrs Williams floated last year. She said parents wishes should be taken into account when children were transferring from primary schools.

The local authority and teacher members of the sub-committee feel strongly that she adopted Conservative Party policy over this and that it was anyway meaningless.

They criticised the delay in giving local authority the power to lay down "planned operating capacities" for each school.

Confusion reigns on grants for race-mix schools

by Caroline Haydon

A survey to be published soon will show that not all local authorities are making the most of Government grants to increase staff in multi-racial schools. The survey, by the National Union of Teachers, is expected to reawaken controversy over the grants, payable under Section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966.

The union sent out questionnaires asking local authorities for details of amounts claimed under this Section and what they are used for. It has so far received replies from 85 of the 104 education authorities.

Eighty-seven are eligible under the Act, which enables l.e.a.s with substantial numbers of Commonwealth immigrant children to retrieve 75 per cent of the salaries of staff employed to help those children. The NUT does not intend to publish names of authorities with the results.

Badly publicised

Section 11 is important because it is the sole means of getting large numbers of extra staff into multi-racial schools. But even now, 12 years after it came into existence, it is still not known whether there are local authorities who should be claiming who are not, while many others have been slow in taking up grants.

In Manchester for instance, where immigrant pupils on the school roll totalled six per cent the last time they were counted, in 1973, the grant claimed under Section 11 for the year 1972-73 was £153,000. It has now more than doubled to £366,000.

In Brent, where the school immigrant population at around the [illegible] time was even higher—a massive 25 per cent—the grant for 1972-73 was only £269,000. But next year Brent is hoping to claim just over £1m.

If an authority is not claiming under Section 11 it does not always mean that it is not making the sort of provision for immigrant children the Act sought to encourage. It may simply be employing staff and be unaware that it can recoup the money. But the suspicion must still remain that children who need help are not receiving it because of a badly publicized fund.

[illegible] where local authorities are claiming substantial amounts they can still come under fire from those who say the money is not spent in the right way. The Commission for Racial Equality is considering a case referred to it by the Leicester branch of the [illegible] the Leicester Community Relations Council and the local branch of the National Association for Multi-Racial Education, all of whom are critical of the way Leicestershire County Council is handling its grant.

The local organizations think the money should be spent on identifiable specialist teachers and not on general additions to teacher numbers. The council, on the contrary, has said that Section 11 money has helped it increase its pupil-teacher ratio across the board.

It does not want extra teachers to teach only immigrants and fears that if such teachers were identified there would be pressure for them to [illegible]

[illegible] authorities are behaving like Leicestershire. Some, like Ealing, have made a compromise. There the council splits its £900,000 grant. Eighty-nine teachers are allotted to schools to help with language teaching, a pool of identifiable specialist staff available for secondment throughout the borough.

But the council also employs 79 "addition to establishment" teachers to boost numbers in schools with high immigrant populations. This, it argues, enables the school to provide more and smaller classes and gives heads an element of discretion in allowing them to decide how and where to deploy staff.

No one doubts that topping up the teaching force does help over-burdened schools. But some teachers feel strongly that swelling the numbers in this way may not help children from ethnic minority groups still not getting the specialist help or positive discrimination they need.

"We have a situation where money which is supposed to meet the needs of immigrant children is not being directed with that aim in mind", says Elizabeth McGovern, education officer of Hackney Community Relations Council, which has criticized the Inner London Education Authority because it gives no figures on Section 11 spending for individual divisions.

The Act provides no clue to help local authorities. It simply says that grants may be paid to l.e.a.s who "are required . . to make special provision . . . in consequence of the presence in their area of substantial numbers of immigrants from the Commonwealth whose language or customs differ from those of the rest of the community".

Problems raised by such vague wording are further compounded by the fact that there is no adequate monitoring of Section 11 expenditure. Grants come via the Home Office, which has no education expertise and relies on district auditors to sift claims. Section 11 is also inter-departmental—claims can be submitted by social services as well as education departments, and it is administratively complex.

Out of date

In addition to all this the collection of statistics on the number of immigrant children in schools was stopped in 1973, so authorities are using five-year-old estimates and educated guesswork in submitting claims.

Section 11 has long been regarded as a loosely-worded anchronism by those who have argued for a centrally-run (possibly DES administered) fund which, unlike Section 11, would allow claims for buildings and equipment as well as staff.

However £20.4m was paid out on all Section 11 claims last year and if anything more, not less, money is now being doled out on this unsatisfactory basis as a result of successful claims on the EEC Social Fund. These have meant that some authorities have already had part of their 25 per cent costs reimbursed for previous years and may get more.

Section 11 is badly out of date—it still talks about New Commonwealth immigrants at a time when ethnic minority groups such as Greek Cypriots pose more problems than influxes of Kenyan Asians—and it is not well understood. A survey with hard evidence of its failures could [illegible]

Setback in NAS fight over Burnham

The National Association of Schoolmasters and Union of Women Teachers has received a setback in its efforts to secure greater representation on the Burnham committee which negotiates teachers' salaries.

After submitting its membership figures of 102,000 to the Government's Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Services (ACAS) upon the suggestion of Mrs Shirley Williams, Education Secretary, it has now been told that the service is unable to help.

At present the NAS-UWT has three seats on Burnham compared with 16 held by the National Union of Teachers, whose membership is 245,000 in the new constitution of the Schools Council. The number of NUT seats was reduced from 17 to 11 while the NAS-UWT retained four.

Despite accepting this adjustment, the NUT refused earlier this year to attend a meeting called by the DES where the representation of the two unions was to be on a five to two basis. This lead to Mrs Williams's suggestion of referral to ACAS.

Now the NAS-UWT has received a letter, dated April 13, in which ACAS virtually washes its hands of the matter. Signed by Mr W. G. McFetteridge, director of enquiry branch five, it reads: "In the course of my discussions with teacher unions I explained the role of the service was conciliation, namely to see if we could assist the unions to reach an understanding among themselves on the question of representation at the proposed joint consultative meetings.

"I also explained that conciliation does not involve the service in making recommendations and that we would not be doing so in this case.

"At a joint meeting of unions under ACAS auspices on March 17 I sought as part of the conciliation procedure to focus discussion on actual numbers. With the agreement of the unions I put forward certain numbers as a basis for discussion, at the same time reminding unions that the service was seeking to assist by conciliation and would not be making recommendations. I was glad to have our recent meeting and hear your views although I am naturally disappointed that there appears at this stage to be no basis for agreement among the unions on the question put to the service by the DES."

At their conference at Harrogate earlier this month the NAS-UWT resolved on militant action if they did not secure pro-rata representation on Burnham. Mr Ron Cocking, treasurer, challenged the NUT to submit their membership figures to independent examination.

Mr Bernard Wakefield, deputy general secretary, said this week that the resolution would be implemented although he did not foresee militant action this side of the summer holidays. In any case the union would seek to achieve their aim through constitutional means first. "But if nothing is done, a constitutional campaign will become an industrial one."

● ACAS has also refused to make recommendations in a dispute among polytechnic lecturers about which union should represent them in negotiations with employers. A majority of the staffs at the polytechnics of Lanchester (Coventry), Portsmouth and North London voted to be represented by the Association of Polytechnic Teachers rather than the National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education. But ACAS says other considerations, including the employment policies of the management must be taken into account.

Unions set for sanctions showdown

Britain's two biggest teacher unions were preparing this week to take action against local education authorities on separate issues.

Regional representatives of the National Association of Schoolmasters-Union of Women Teachers met yesterday to consider what sanctions they would apply from May 8 in their campaign to have out-of-school activities recognized as voluntary.

The National Union of Teachers prepared to extend to a further three the sanctions against oversize classes already operating in seven local education authorities.

The basic grievance of the NAS-UWT is that income tax has to be paid on expenses received in connection with out-of-school activities.

Mr Fred Smithies, education secretary, said this week that the union's members would refuse to partake in out-of-school activties "arising out of the organization of the school." This would mean no attendance at parents evenings, speech days or staff meetings. But activities largely inspired by the enthusiasm of the teacher, such as games or clubs, would not be affected. Nor would school meal supervision, which is already nationally recognized as voluntary.

By Monday the NUT expects its members in more than 1,300 schools in 10 authorities to be taking action against oversized classes. Tactics will vary between not covering for colleaguesabsent for more than one day to refusing to teach infant classes of more than 27, primary classes over 32 and secondary classes with more than 30.

The union estimates that action on these lines saved 5,000 teaching jobs last year.

Authorities already affected are Barnsley (97 schools), Surrey (178), Warwickshire (89), Avon (323), Bexley (62), Buckinghamshire (144) and Calderdale (108).

Action is planned to start on Monday in Humberside (144), Coventry [illegible]

An inspector calls

Regular school inspections are making a comeback in one London borough. Bob Doe reports

Two-week inspections of every school in Hillingdon are being carried out by the West London borough as part of a comprehensive scheme to unify, support and monitor schools' work.

The scheme also involves eight hours or more of assessments for every 11-year-old, guides to basic maths and English teaching, linked to in-service training and an early screening system to identify children at risk.

The inspections, called "in-depth visits" by the advisers who carry them out and conducted in pairs, have already begun in the primary schools. Over a period of two weeks primary advisers, occasionally accompanied by subject specialist advisers, spend most of their time in two selected primary schools. At the end they discuss their observations with the staff and finally a report on each of the schools is written.

The formal procedure for these inspections is now being agreed by primary heads in the borough. They will get a term's advance notice and will be invited to add their own comments to the final report.

Only four schools a term get such inspections, out of the 80 primaries in the borough, although Hillingdon's primary advisers have already systematically visited every one of them in a series of one-day visits.

A similar procedure for in-depth secondary inspections is also being worked out with secondary head teachers in the borough.

Hillingdon's primary adviser, Mr Peter Smith, said, "These inspections allow us to see a school in a more natural state, to see a wide range of activities, to make helpful suggestions and to increase our own knowledge of different approaches and problems in Hillingdon schools."

The inspections are a part of an effort to provide greater support and continuity in Hillingdon's schools, which went fully comprehensive last year. It was felt necessary to replace and improve on the information provided in the past by the 11 plus.

"We want to provide a structure that still enables teachers to provide a truly child-centred education without going back to the old rote learning approach", said Mr Smith. "We are committed to progressive education but it must be structured."

A series of guidelines to maths teaching have been published, covering topics like number, shape and area, and a similar guide to literacy teaching is about to appear.

These suggest appropriate objectives for different age groups and means of achieving them. They also say what point a child should have reached before going on to the next stage.

The work was done by groups of teachers and advisers and then sent to every school for comment and revised accordingly.

To ensure that information about every child transferring to secondary school is available in a uniform and ready reference form, every 11-year-old in the borough is assessed at the start of their final primary term.

To do this, assessment exercises—the word tests is deliberately avoided—have been developed by working parties of teachers and advisers. Consultants from the National Foundation for Educational Research were also involved.

Maths is covered by 10 worksheets, intended to be completed as part of normal classwork. No time limit is set for them and each takes about half an hour to complete.

Each one covers one mathematical topic such as addition, subtraction, shape, ratio or money. Children are assessed on each on a below average—average—above average scale.

An English profile is similarly built up for each child from worksheets devoted to comprehension, punctuation and dictation. Teachers add to this their own subjective judgment of a piece of imaginative and factual writing done by each child, the results of the GAP reading test and information about any special communications disability from which a child might suffer. As with the maths, the profile and the work it is built up from, is then sent on to the receiving secondary school.

As many of the borough's junior schools have embarked on primary French courses, oral French assessments have also been developed—so that secondary schools can have some indication of where each child's ability is in this subject.

All this takes up a great deal of time in the last year of primary schooling, and as the Hillingdon education authority sees all the results it is in effect a monitoring of the performance of every school.

However, primary heads in the borough find the process acceptable. Mr Basil Patching, head of Hayes Park Junior School, described the assessment as "a very valid exercise", that would improve with time. It could not, however, replace the personal contacts between primary and secondary teachers that were still necessary, he pointed out. Primary teachers needed a little time to adjust to the fact that it was the children who were being tested and not themselves, and that there was no question of any one school being singled out as a failure.

Mr John Chevous, head of Whitehall Junior School, said the assessments were diagnostically helpful and well thought out. He had doubts about the GAP reading test but this would be re when a more suitable o found.

Naturally there had been fears, Mr Chevous said teachers had been assured the no question of the results used for selection. "We d want eleven plus under a name."

These two heads were happy about the inspection thought most of their co were as well. Mr Patching they knew their advisers w assumed they would be the give help. Mr Chevous, school is scheduled for a next term, said they did no it as an inspection but "a chance for them to see wha are doing, to assess it and out things we are not doing could do better. It is a time to help."

But Hillingdon National Un Teachers are not so enthu Mr Vimal Sharma, the local se tary, complained that there been no consultation with over the inspections. He th the inspectors would do bett talk with teachers first abo kind of professional advice considered necessary. "The thing is dubious and is going looked at shortly by teache organizations."

Mr Sharma was also dubi about the usefulness of transfer assessment sche though happy with the consulta and revisions allowed for in In wondering if secondary sc would use the results, he refle the major reservation of teac identified by the NFER in evaluation of the scheme.

The Foundation's report on the trial stage of the project poi pointed two main reactions from teachers. One was that the asse ments were only worthwhile if secondary schools actually made considerable use of them. But con trasting view was that such asse ments were useful in their own right, giving primary schools a detailed review of important aspects of a pupil's learning and feedback on the schools' own effectiveness.

PERSONAL COLUMN

Gerry Fowler

Planning by numbers

A fortnight ago I wrote of the problems caused by falling school rolls, and suggested that, preoccupied as they were with sectional interests, educationists did not in general have a comprehensive strategy for solving them, or for seizing the new opportunities which they offered. Similar problems, and similar opportunities, manifest themselves in post-school education. There, too, numbers will fall if present policies are maintained without amendment—although the decline in numbers will of course come later. And there, too, there is at present a failure of vision.

The recent DES discussion document on higher education into the 1990s deals primarily with numbers—as is conventional in such documents. On present trends, the number of 18-year-olds qualified for and seeking places in higher education will peak between 1982 and 1985, then fall as the size of the age-group declines. There are short-term problems of providing the buildings, equipment, and staff to accommodate and to teach the bulge (or alternatively, of excluding from higher education many who in the last 15 years would have secured admission without difficulty). There are long-term posers too—of staff redundancy and the sale of buildings, or of the attraction and admission to higher education of groups at present excluded from it, or not seeking places in it.

The document, while sensibly and without bias setting out the policies [illegible] these difficulties, fails to set them in a broader social context, or adequately to discuss the cost and the practicability of each. One element is of course constantly rising unemployment, or its alternative, shorter working hours (excluding here teachers and politicians). This is an inevitable consequence of changing technology. It might be said that this is nothing to do with DES. But it is after all upon higher investment in modern plant and equipment that the Government's industrial strategy rests—and DES remains part of the Government.

Another consequence of new technology is that the nature and the number of highly qualified manpower which we require are also changing. There is no such thing as a "steady state" in higher education: even if numbers remain constant, the pattern of physical plant, of staff appointment, and of student admission may change.

I do not believe in detailed manpower forecasting conducted in a policy vacuum. I do believe that policies for public education as a whole, and for particular sectors of it, must evolve within broad policy plans for the utilisation of its products and for the stimulation of demand for it. It is the question of demand for higher education which brings us back to practicability and cost.

The most acceptable of the DES strategies entails the attraction of new groups into higher education from the mid-1980s. There may be, for example, many more full-time mature students (as well as part-time adult learners). But that means that we must by then have a general system of paid educational [illegible] for the refurbishing of skills, or just for personal development. Perhaps too we must have a system of what the Americans call entitlements, or the right to renewed education and training of a value increasing over time. While DES has commissioned a study of PEL, there is no public policy in either area, and precious little discussion of either. Without this, the admission of significantly more mature students is meaningless as a policy option.

Another possibility is the admission to higher education of more working-class students (and women?) Registrar-General's classes C, D and E (the circumlocution used to avoid saying working-class) remain grossly underrepresented in higher education. But to attract more of them, we must provide a more generous and equitable system of financial support for 16 to 18-years-old.

What would be the true cost o such arrangements? It certainly would not be the apparent cost, if the alternative were indeed higher levels of youth and of general u employment, entailing a mount social security bill. But wit some estimate of the cost—th again entails assumptions about t social context in which policies w be implemented—we cannot sensibly discuss the various alternatives.

If there are to be many mo part-time students in higher edu tion, which institutions shall provi the courses for them? Clearly th would include the polytechnics a certain other FE institutions. B what about local FE colleges with present little or no higher educati provision? That would be necessa if opportunities were to be eve distributed across the nation. But would run counter to the strategy filling otherwise spare places existing higher education, and t recommendations of the regi Oakes group report on the manag ment of public sector higher educ tion would be likely to discoura it. Shall economy or equity hav precedence?

Finally, there are the universities. Will they take many more part-timers from the immediate locality and more working-class and more mature students (perhaps, with poorer prior educational qualifications than today's average student)? Will they consider running two-year courses (the DipHE?), with the right of readmission granted at a later date to successful students? And for the completion of a degree? At present the answer seems to be a firm and resounding No.

Two weeks ago I suggested that we lacked educationists with vision. In post-secondary education the voice of those whom we do have is often muted in consequence of the diffuse and fragmented structure of management and control of British education. The universities, the polytechnics, the UGC, and ot the l.e.a.s all represent sectional interests. Only DES can give national lead. It is often timorous of so doing, lest it tread upon the sensitive corns of its many "partners". But if we do not have a comprehensive, costed, and practicable strategy for educational development soon, set in the context of broader social assumptions and social policies, the ache from the corns will spread to every part of the educational system.

Job escape clause proposed for hard-pressed heads

by Stephen Cohen

A "safety valve" of early retirement for heads who are overcome by the pressures of running large schools was proposed this week by the new president of the Secondary Heads Association.

Miss Mollie Blake, headmistress of Manchester High School for Girls, said the increased pressures faced by head teachers made her query whether permanent employment was realistic.

"With the greatly increased pressures and complexities within which we now have to work and with the persistence of changing circumstances I am not sure that the long periods of tenure applauded in the past are meaningful or appropriate now or in the foreseeable future."

Miss Blake, first president of the association which was formed out of the merger between the Headmasters' Association and the Association of Head Mistresses, said at Lancaster University that it was well known that there were people in high places and elsewhere who pressed the claim that heads should be on fixed-term contracts which should be reviewed every few years.

"These arguments are unjust in the way they neglect the head's right for a level of security no less satisfactory than for other teachers."

The controversy was bedevilled by an assumption that there were large numbers of incompetent, insensitive heads holding on to office to the detriment of their schools. It was also wrongly believed that there was no machinery for sacking heads.

"Both these claims are without any sound foundation, and we should individually and through this association refute the argument for compulsory restriction of tenure."

At the same time, Miss Blake said she was not sure whether it was right for heads to be guaranteed their jobs for life.

"However, if it is right that many heads should voluntarily hold a specific headship for a more limited time, then there are implications for the structure of the service.

"Early retirement with enhanced pensions could be the answer in certain cases, but my present concern is for the head for whom that solution is not appropriate and for whom a more adequate and flexible pattern of career development is necessary."

The contraction of the education service meant that the more traditional avenues of transfer to colleges of education, the advisory service, administration or the inspectorate were unlikely to provide the solution for most heads. The problem was aggravated by the effect of falling school rolls which would result in the likely closure of secondary schools.

"Ways must be found to ensure that the wisdom and expertise of the experienced heads are not lost to the service and that any sideways move onto a parallel ladder can be made without any loss of accrued benefits in terms of career status and pension rights".

Earlier Miss Blake said it was important for heads to belong to the association particularly in "these professionally vulnerable and often litigious days". A forthcoming edition of the association's journal would carry details of cases where legal advice had proved helpful to members who had been threatened with court action.

When the marking had to stop

AUT members will down tools in protest at their pay anomaly. Bert Lodge looks at the dispute

The scripts of university students doing finals next month will be gathered in as usual at the end of the day but, instead of marking them, members of the Association of University Teachers will carefully lock them away until the Government, as one lecturer put it, "come up with something that looks like business".

That would have to be a positive gesture to rectify pay anomalies university lecturers have been smarting under since 1975. And the intention to refuse to mark examinations is not a new idea forced up out of acute desperation. As far back as April 1975 AUT branches were proposing the measure, together with a refusal to fill in UCCA forms and a withdrawal of services from any governmental or semi-official body.

Up to that year university lecturers had been watching the value of their income go down, like everybody else's, as the cost of living rose. They were not notably more discontented than any other white collar set of professionals. But the previous December a Government committee chaired by Lord Houghton, which had been looking into the erosion of pay suffered by teachers in other than the university sector, recommended substantial increases and these were implemented four months later.

One of the recommendations was that further education lecturers who spent at least 50 per cent of their time on degree work should receive broadly the same as university lecturers. At the same time the recommended increases, at a time when dons' salaries were still bogged down in negotiations, put the polytechnic staff ahead. Their salary scale now ran from £2,670 to £5,412 compared with from £2,118 to £4,896 in universities.

This would have been bearable for a short while provided the AUT claim pending at the time had been met in full: an increase of 18 per cent backdated to October, 1974. And, of course, AUT negotiators were backing this up with the same arguments that had been used to impress the Houghton Committee—the degree to which all teachers' salaries had been steadily falling compared with other employees since 1965. The University Authorities Panel agreed with the claim, which was submitted in February.

The Government did not agree. It would break the "social contract" understanding of not more than one pay rise in 12 months.

Angry at the rejection, AUT branches up and down the country planned a day of action on May 6: one-day or half-day strikes, a lobby of Parliament. A refusal to return examination marks was voted at the association's summer council meeting.

What the DES proposed was, in effect, no increase of any sort before October 1975. Then during the following 12 months there should be step-by-step increases to establish parity with polytechnic lecturers as Houghton suggested. Once these increases had been settled there would be a separate cost-of-living increase determined for the year October 1974 to October 1975 to be paid in full from October 1975 subject to any Government pay policy in force at the time of negotiations.

It was the Government's intention to stand firm on the "social contract" 12-month rule which led to a breakdown in negotiations. Being picked out by the Government as one group to make a stand against was regarded by the AUT members as the first anomaly they had to suffer.

The second was more cruel. The issue went to arbitration and the findings, published just as the summer term was drawing to a close, was an award of 20 to 23 per cent together with a cost-of-living increase which was expected to be something in the region of 22 to 23 per cent.

But the Government had already begun to talk of a "voluntary" incomes policy and in July produced a White Paper, The Attack on Inflation. Mr Laurie Sapper, AUT general secretary, was still confident the cost of living award would be honoured, in addition to the pay increase. After all, the White Paper stipulated that arbitration awards should be met, provided reference was made to a tribunal before the White Paper was issued.

The Government saw it differently. It decided that the only cost-of-living increase allowable to anybody was £6 a week. That was all university lecturers got. That was the second anomaly.

For nearly three years the Government has agreed with the AUT that it had met with hard fortune and that, as soon as pay restrictions slackened, the rise everybody agree its members merited but never got would be paid.

Last month Mrs Shirley Williams, Education Secretary, told the Commons that the Government was prepared to implement the award over the next three years. But, the AUT say, she will have to advance further than that if those scripts are to be marked next month.

Resentment at cancelled speech

Delegates made no secret of their resentment at the news that the Education Secretary had cancelled a speech she was to have made to the conference on Tuesday in order to attend Commons Question Time. They decided to ask for a special meeting with her in London to make up for it.

Mrs Shirley Williams had agreed at Christmas to deliver a major address to the association. But she backed out over Easter. The DES refused to send either of her deputies, Mr Gordon Oakes or Miss Margaret Jackson.

This is not the first time Mrs Williams has cancelled an engagement with the head teachers' associations. Last year Mr Oakes turned up in her place to the conference of one of the association's constituent unions and was given a cool reception by delegates who had to listen to him proposing the closure of sixth forms in secondary schools.

Standards again come under fire

Sir Charles Carter, vice-chancellor of Lancaster University, congratulated the head teachers on sending more relaxed generation of students to college, but said that their level of preparation for university was dangerously low.

"When I compare them with people coming from overseas, I see a dangerous gap opening up between our education system and the overseas systems. The standard of work accepted, the standard of going into things thoroughly is not high enough.

"A number of my colleagues have for some time been expressing concern over standards. Some Continental school systems which are tougher and require a more general education produce, I think, a better suited product.

"A greater degree of attention to excellence is needed."

Code of practice claimed as key to good discipline

Schools which handle discipline well generally have an accepted code of practice for punishing pupils according to a survey published this week. Staff work as a team and parents play their part.

These are the conclusions of Mr Mark Stedman, assistant secretary of the Assistant Masters Association, whose research is based on visits to 32 London comprehensives.

But, says Mr Stedman in the association's journal, The AMA, it is most important that senior staff should not leave teaching altogether so that the teachers can really work as a team.

A code of practice for discipline, he writes, does not necessarily need to be written down. It is certainly not the same as a rigid set of rules. "In the larger schools discipline procedures need to be carefully discussed by all staff and agreement is needed so that there is a reasonable consistency of treatment both of minor breaches of discipline and of major problems when they arise".

The code of practice should be based on the assumption that a senior member of staff will be told about a pupil's bad behaviour. "A single incident may be part of a pattern, and a series of reports on the same pupil from different teachers would enable further consideration to be given to the problem."

Parents will support the way schools tackle discipline if they have been invited to school for open days and parents' evenings, says Mr Stedman. If school uniform is required, then it should be enforced, otherwise there could be trouble.

Schools should have a system of rewards as well as punishment, however.

Computer 'too inaccurate' for timetabling

Timetabling by computer is too expensive and inaccurate according to a booklet published this week by the National Foundation for Educational Research. Computers are not the answer to the "most important and most demanding single task which has to be performed in any secondary school", says its author, Mr F. B. Salt, headmaster of South Hunsley School, North Humberside.

He argues for the use of timetabling models; arithmetical and diagrammatical representations of the way different timetable variables can be organized.

In a school of 300 pupils, he says, there are likely to be 2,400 teaching periods a week, each of which has to be allocated to a class, a teacher, a room, a subject and a time. "The master timetabler has to make 12,000 decisions, all of them right."

Computer timetbling is still far from being satisfactory in the percentage of periods successfully timetabled. Typical costs are £10 a tutor group, or £500 for a school of 1,300.

Timetabling models can be constructed in a schematic form that leave curriculum decisions in the hands of the head and staff and can be used in a wide variety of schools, he says. They combined the "speed and effortless of computer timetabling with the best charactristics of the traditional method; low cost and high effectiveness."

Timetabling Models for Secondary Schools by F. B. Salt published by NFER, price £6.30.

Parents get the biggest slice

Parents will be the main beneficiaries of a £40m increase in Government spending on student grants announced this week.

Mrs Williams, the Education Secretary, told the Commons that adjustments in the rate of parental grant contributions would mean an average reduction of £27 a year paid by parents for each student.

"The scales of parental contributions have been revised", she said, "to take account both of changes in average earnings and of the need to compensate students' parents for further reductions in their child tax allowance consequent on the second stage of the introduction of the child benefit scheme."

The revised scales raise the starting point for parental contributions from a £3,200 residual income (income after deductions for dependants, mortgages and superannuation) to £3,800. The minimum grant has been increased from £80 to £200.

Students grants are themselves to be increased by between £85 and £170 in September. For students living away from home in London the grant will rise from £1,145 to £1,315. Students away from home outside London will receive £1,100 instead of £1,010. Home-based students will be given £870 instead of £785.

Mrs Williams said the changes would bring the value of the grant in 1978-79 broadly in line with its value in 1974-75 following the last full DES review.

The new rates apply to mandatory awards given to students on degree and initial teacher training Diploma of Higher Education courses, Higher National Diploma courses and higher diplomas of the Technician and Business Education Councils. The changes will bring the total cost of grants to public funds to about £310m in 1978-79

Moving fast on testing–Mrs Williams

The Government is moving with all speed on the issue of testing and assessing standards in schools, said Mrs Shirley Williams, Secretary of State for Education and Science, in the Commons this week. She is satisfied with the development of national sample testing by the department's Assessment of Performance Unit.

She told Mr Nigel Forman (Sutton, Carshalton, C) that the unit would proceed this year to the assessment of mathematics, next year to languages and the year after to sciences. The monitoring suggested was sensible and would be useful to the educational performance of the country.

She could, she said, think of nothing more upsetting to education than the reintroduction of selection. "I find it astonishing that the education spokesmen of the Conservative Party are now suggesting to bring back grammar schools when, under Mrs Thatcher, the proportion of children going to comprehensive schools increased from 28 per cent to 55 per cent. It is hard to find out where they stand."

The experience of the United States, where there was an attempt to test every child in certain states, led to the conclusion by the National Educational Association, a non-political body, that the blanket use of tests required an inordinate amount of time by teachers and others. "That experience is borne out by ours."

Mr Timothy Raison (Aylesbury, C) urged Mrs Williams to take a less dogmatic view of testing. It was not a question of creating competition but of finding out without competition what levels of performance existed in children in the national school system.

That, she replied, was exactly what the unit was concerned about. It was based on a light sampling of 2 per cent of the children in the country. Teachers, governors and others represented within the unit considered this was the appropriate way to monitor performance. It was the Tory attempt to test every pupil every year that was dogmatic.

All their own work—pupils from Netherley Comprehensive School admire their handiwork on exhibition at Walker Art Gallery, Liverpool.

Meals now to cost £377m

The schools-meals service would cost £377m said Mrs Williams, when questioned in the Commons this week on the Budget announcement that school meals charges would not be raised.

Local authorities would be reimbursed for the income they would otherwise lose this financial year. There would be consultations with their associations about how best to do this.

The decision to allow the subsidy to decline was taken before two years of pay policy, and it was in the light of that that the Government felt that families badly needed help with school meals.

Sixth forms: Mr Neil Marten (Banbury, C) asked what were the criteria for a secondary comprehensive school having a sixth form. Mrs Shirley Williams said she had to look at every proposal for the establishment of a sixth form on its merits. But her concern was that there should be an adequate range of courses without uneconomic staffing or at the expense of the rest of the school. This suggested normally a minimum of 70 pupils and preferably 100.

Disruptive pupils: Miss Jackson said HM Inspectorate had recently undertaken a survey of special units for disruptive pupils. "On the basis of this", she said, "we hope to publish this summer a report which may be helpful to those authorities which have already set up units or are contemplating doing so".

Primary schools: So far this year 14 proposals to close primary schools in England had been approved. In 1977 the figure was 87, said Miss Jackson.

7 per cent more go to polys

The number of new students in polytechnics rose by 7 per cent in 1977-78, according to the Committee of Directors of Polytechnics.

The main growth was in sandwich courses, which were up by 11 per cent since 1976, and short courses, up by 14 per cent. In teacher training, however, enrolments slumped despite the mergers with colleges of education.

Army pulls in young unemployed

Every time the teenage unemployment rate rises by 1 per cent, Army recruitment rises by 2 per cent, according to a study of enlistment by Dr Ian Bellany of Lancaster University.

The study shows that unemployment has little effect on service [illegible] exception is among young people joining the Army, the largest single block of enlistments in any of the Services. In 1976 the Army took in 12,912 young entrants, compared with 5,078 in the Navy, and 2,659 in the Air Force.

Nearly two-thirds of all young people who joined the Army did so because of unemployment, relative wages, and the chance of seeing action in Northern Ireland. Unemployment was the most important of the three.

"The reason why unemployment matters only for Army young entrants is probably connected with the significant difference in the educational attainment of young entrants to the three Services", Dr Bellany concludes.

A survey in 1969 showed that the typical soldier below NCO rank had less than 0.2 O level passes, compared with 0.5 per cent for sailors, and 0.7 per cent for airmen.

Workers children hang back

The proportion of children of manual workers entering [illegible] has tended to decline [illegible] years, Mr Gordon Oakes [illegible] of State for Education [illegible] told the Commons this week. In 1976 they made up only 24 per cent of successful applicants.

He told Mr William Hamilton (Central Fife, Lab) that the Secretary of State and [illegible] concern about the trend. What might be done to increase participation by this group was one of the matters on which the DES had invited views in its recent discussion document, Higher Education into the 1990s.

And since the university population [illegible] birth rate in the 1960s, it was something to which the universities would have to pay particular regard.

Mr Rhodes Boyson, Opposition spokesman on education, said the decline in the number of entrants to university from manual working classes had come at the same time as the country had moved to comprehensive schools. While this might be working in country and small town areas, maybe it was in downtown areas in city centres that social mobility had been reduced and the deprived child from a poor background was not getting the way through that he did with good grammar schools.

Mr Oakes said this was a travesty of the truth. It was because O and A levels were available to a larger range of students than in the past [illegible] than they otherwise would.

ILEA considers clamp down on Front meetings in schools

by Caroline Haydon

As teachers at Loughborough Junior School, in Brixton, were left to pick up the pieces after a National Front meeting in the school at the weekend there were signs of a move towards a ban on similar meetings in Inner London schools.

The Inner London Education Authority is asking people who were at the Lambeth by-election meeting to come forward with evidence that it was not genuinely open to the public. Such evidence could lead to the authority refusing the party permission to hold meetings in its schools.

Mr Martin Webster, the party's national activities organizer, personally vetted people at the school gate turning away known anti-Front demonstrators from the meeting, at which 34 people, including Mr Webster, were arrested.

Mr Terry McCarthy, deputy head at the school, said he was twice refused entry by Mr Webster. "The third time I said I was a teacher at the school and I was allowed in. But this could certainly not be called a public meeting."

Under the 1949 Representation of the People Act authorities are bound to provide school premises for the use of bona fide election candidates who have the right to hire them for public meetings. The Act, however, does not define a public meeting and the clause has never been tested in the courts.

Sir Ashley Bramall, leader of the ILEA, said this week that although there were impeccable democratic reasons for the Act making such provisions, he was sure that Parliament in 1949 had not considered the effect of a National Front meeting on a multi-racial community. He appealed for evidence to b submitted as quickly as possible fo examination by the authority's soli citors.

Meanwhile the ILEA has granted permission for the Front to hold a borough election meeting at Wh more primary school, Hoxton, i east London on April 29.

Further signs that some amendment of the Act is being considered came this week when the Department of Education and Science said that Mrs Shirley Williams, Education Secretary, had discussed th matter with the Home Secretary, Mr Merlyn Rees.

Last Saturday's meeting was the second the Front has held at Loughborough School. Eighteen months ago it used the infant school for a by-election meeting. Today teachers at the junior and infant schools are holding a post-mortem on the weekend's events.

A newly polished hall floor had been badly scratched and splintered so that PE classes were dangerous and pictures had been torn from the walls, said Mr McCarthy. Apart from the physical damage school life had been disrupted. "This has taken up a lot of our time when we should be educating the children."

● Twelve people were arrested on Tuesday after a National Front by-election at Hatters Lane Comprehensive School, High Wycombe. More than 600 police turned up at the school and violence broke out after demonstrators clashed with Front supporters.

● Police are investigating an attack on members of the young National Front outside Copleston High School, Ipswich, last week. Scuffles broke out when they began distributing leaflets entitled "How to Combat Red Teachers".

EEC will spend £70m to keep young off the dole

The European Economic Community, which has just forced Britain to abandon its main employment subsidies, has now decided to back job-saving subsidies for the young.

The commission has agreed to spend part of its Social Fund on what it calls "primes d'embauche"—employment premiums to be paid by member governments to employers to take on young workers. Britain's youth employment subsidy, which would have been likely to qualify for support, is about to end.

This is the only specific proposal in the new EEC programme of help for the young unemployed. For the rest, the commission has simply given its approval for the fund to spend money on helping countries with measures "to put the young unemployed to work".

In practice, the fund is likely to favour measures such as work experience and the pilot schemes of transitional education now being promoted by the commission's edu cation division.

The new payments will begin 1979, and the commission expec that it will spend just over £70m the first year to get about 150,0 youngsters off the dole. This repr sents only about one in 25 Europe's jobless under 25s—whi may be why the EEC officials, wh politicians have been proclaimi their determination to take ma steps to combat youth unemplo ment, are keeping remarkably qu about the programme.

Britain may, as a result of th changes, get less help for the u employed from the Social Fund th in the past. Because it has conc trated on the kind of measures— particular, training—which met t fund's existing criteria, it got £2 last year, a larger share than mo other countries.

Cash hopes unite youth groups

Britain's major youth groups are trying to sink their rivalries and present a united front to the Government. The inducement is money and political influence.

The unity drive has been encouraged by the formation of the Parliamentary Youth Lobby under Mr Edward Heath, MP, and by the success of two of the organizations in getting Department of Education and Science grants for political education. The National Association of Youth Clubs announced this week that they are to get more than £17,000 a year for this purpose, the same as the grant which is being given to the British Youth Council.

The NAYC will use its money to appoint a headquarters official to provide material for use in its clubs. The council is to take on researchers for the same purpose, but will involve its member organizations—who include the youth wings of most political parties as well as associations like the scouts and guides—into the preparation and vetting of the material.

Mr Dennis Stevenson, the asso tion's chairman, said that the thr year scheme was an experiment see whether major social and poli ical issues which affected you people could be put to them in understandable way.

The target group were not sixt formers or the articulate member of club committees but you people who were politically unawa and alienated from the politic system. "Our youth workers, wh are in a close relationship wi many of these youngsters, hav been begging us to provide the with the information which w enable them to put some sort critical analysis before their me bers.

"It's not a question of thrusti information about political parti at them, but of placing before the —in a way which they can handl the rival views and proposed so tions on matters which are of dir concern to them—such as unemplo ment."

Underspending costs schools £97.5m

by Lucy Hodges

Cuts in spending on education and libraries for the year 1976-77 went further than outlined by the Government and caused a significant reduction in the quality of the services provided. This is revealed by a newly published analysis of the rate support grant—the money contributed by the Government to local authority services such as education.

Underspending affected particularly the administration and inspection of schools, child guidance and health services, physical education and university grants. The shortfall on these items amounted to £37,300,000. And this financial year (1977-78) l.e.a.s are expected to spend £7,700,000 less than was allocated to these services.

School meals and provision of milk were even worse affected with a cut of £47,500,000. This year the saving is expected to be £23m. The library service lost £6,400,000. This year the cut is forecast to be £1,200,000.

This breakdown of the difference between the rate support grant settlement and local authority spending is produced annually by five local government organizations: the Association of County Councils, the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, the Association of District Councils, the London Boroughs Association, and the Greater London Council.

The report shows that in 1976-77 total underspending on education was £97,500,000 or 1.8 per cent. There were large reductions in building programmes and restrictions on admitting under-fives to the infant classes of primary schools.

"In 1977-78 the estimated underspending in volume terms on current expenditure compared with RSG settlement is £111,100,000 and this shortfall arises largely because of the economies made by local authorities in 1976-77.

"It is apparent, however, that, in many areas, these economies have involved a temporary deferment of expenditure rather than a permanent reduction in expenditure base."

This is particularly obvious in the area of non-teaching costs. The report says that the cuts cannot be restored this year but that next year l.e.a.s will inevitably have to replace equipment and stocks of books at a higher rate than would otherwise have been necessary. It has allowed a 2 per cent increase for this.

Religion through dance felt to be a flop

Doubts on the effectiveness of two currently fashionable approaches to religious education are expressed in a booklet this week from the Association of Christian Teachers.

RE as part of integrated studies or through dance and drama can fail to reach the pupil, say two higher education teachers of religion.

"There are signs that the high hopes vested in implicit religion are not being justified by the schemes operating in the schools. Much depends on whether the head of the integrated studies department is sympathetic to RE and it seems there may be a tendency to appoint to these positions people from subject discipline other than religious studies", writes Mr Norman Richards, senior lecturer in religious and social studies at Middleton St George college of education.

Mr Brynmor Jones, senior lecturer in divinity, Gwent college of higher education, who admits to having become almost enthusiastic once or twice about the potential of a partnership between religion and the expressive arts now has misgivings.

"There is a strong probability that alliance with the expressive arts will strengthen the already powerful bias towards a 'humanist religion' or 'religion of humanity'. Expressive arts theorists share the conviction that their creative work is an outpouring of the human spirit."

Allowing that the idea of hidden theology might be grasped by the teacher and his colleagues, Mr Richards doubts that pupils—particularly in the first and third years where many integrated schemes are found—can appreciate such a sophisticated idea.

"It seems that as the explicit nature of RE is reduced, so pupils' awareness of its existence diminishes."

Mr Jones points to a second great danger from the strong element of fiction within mime, puppetry, dance or drama. Though children may act and talk readily about moral and social issues they do not transfer the acted experiences and decisions to their own real experience of life.

Meddling threatens small-class chances, union claims

Government interference in schools makes it less likely that the benefits of falling school rolls will be realized, says the National Union of Teachers' magazine, Secondary Education.

In an editorial it says falling rolls could not have come at a worse time. They have coincided with education cuts and teacher unemployment and widespread suspicion among teachers because of the Secretary of State's unprecedented intervention in the school system.

And this was happening just when teachers should be joining forces with central and local government to reap the benefits of smaller classes, says the paper.

The difficulties were formidable. Job security, prospects, redeployment, early retirement and redundancy would have to be considered along with the criteria for closing or "mothballing" of schools. The curriculum and the availability of options, too, was "an area of concern".

"These challenges will severely tax the resourcefulness, imagination and resolve of the profession. Local authorities, in turn, will have to demonstrate that they are prepared to play their part by committing resources and personnel to assist the teachers to make the necessary far-reaching readjustments."

Law change urged for working children

Children who do part-time work should be protected by the law of the land rather than by local by-laws, says the Association of Metropolitan Authorities.

Conditions of employment—age, hours worked and so on—permits and records should be centrally controlled. This could be done under the Employment of Children Act 1973, but the Government had chosen to do nothing because of the extra cost.

Mrs Nikki Harrison, new chairman of the association's education committee, said it was important to have a national system because it looked unjust otherwise. "Introducing national regulations might possibly bring additional costs", but in this case we feel the change is in the best interests of the children."

One of the few: in other EEC countries many more children go to nursery school.

Nursery hopes 'non existent'

by Caroline Haydon

The shortage of nursery school places in Britain is "a scandal", Mr Fred Smithies, assistant general secretary of the National Association of Schoolmasters/Union of Women Teachers, said this week.

Even in authorities where provision is considered good—like Inner London, Bedfordshire and Newcastle—only one three-year-old in 10 and one four-year-old in four has any chance of a place.

In other authorities, like Bromley and Wiltshire, "the chances of nursery education are so remote as to be practically non-existent". In Gloucestershire there is no nursery provision.

Introducing a union discussion paper on educational provision for the under-fives, Mr Smithies said that "inadequate provision of genuine, professionally-based nursery education is one of the greatest causes of educational injustice in this country.

"It is nothing short of a scandal that most of our EEC partners do significantly better in providing for the real education of three and four-year-olds." In France 85 per cent of four-year-olds and 75 per cent of three-year-olds receive nursery education.

Despite encouragement from successive governments since the start of nursery expansion under the urban aid programme of 1969, says the paper, many authorities are opting out of their responsibility to provide it.

In 1973 and 1974 £38.4m was earmarked by the Department of Education for nursery building projects but some authorities had failed to respond. Under the expanded urban programme for 1978-79 resources would again be available for new projects for the under-fives. This time, it was to be hoped, authorities would meet their responsibilities.

All types of children from all social classes, it says, need nursery education stimuli which "will develop the qualities and abilities necessary as a basis for school education". The need is greatest in homes which do not provide the intellectual and social experiences to enable the child to learn successfully at infant school.

The union calls for better levels of provisions, better use of spare capacity in primary schools, attention to the training and in-service needs of those who work with the under-fives, more parent-teacher cooperation and positive discrimination in favour of socially deprived areas.

Schools Council poised for metamorphosis

by Bob Doe

The Schools Council's Governing Council was expected to vote itself out of existence on Thursday, by accepting the new constitution instigated by the recent review of council workings.

Under the new constitution, intended to give more lay representation on committees, the Governing Council will be replaced by three committees: Convocation, a forum in which a broad range of interests are represented; the Profesional Committee, dominated by the teacher unions and responsible for the work of the council, and a powerful policy making Finance and Priorities Committee on which local and central government nominees have a majority over teachers.

Though a number of amendments had been tabled, desig mainly to get more representa of higher education on to comm tees, the main proposals were e pected to get a majority at the of the week's meeting

"The indications are that th people mainly concerned with th Schools Council think we have g it about right and should ge with it," said Mrs Dorothy one of the three joint secreta of the council who will be repla by a single senior executive as result of the proposals.

The meeting was also expe to be the last to be chaired Sir Alex Smith, the council's o going chairman. He is hand over to Mr John Tomlinson, chi education officer of Cheshire.

. . . but not in Wales

The Committee for Wales will have greater powers in the reorganized Schools Council but remain substantially in the hands of the vested interests that control it at present.

The council's review did not include suggestions about reform of the Welsh committee because it was left to the committee to review itself.

Although the committee was asked to "devise appropriate means for involving lay interests in the work of the council", the proposed membership of the new Welsh committee includes none of the broader interests represented on the new Schools Council through its Convocation. Neither were any of those interests represented on the Welsh review committee, as they were on the main review committee.

Representatives of the TUC, CBI and Confederation of Parent Teachers Associations will be allowed to attend meetings as observers, but the Welsh committee suggests that lay opinion in Wales is best taken into account through ad hoc groups or working parties established by the committee to consider particular issues.

The Welsh committee's rep talks of the "relative cohesivene of those involved in educatio the Principality making it easi encourage the council's wor Wales.

omplaint that boarding fees at oluntary aided school in Cum- had risen unreasonably has rejected by the local govern- ombudsman.

Fees at the school, which has ces for 180 boarders, rose from 0 a year in 1975-76 to £825 in 778. Parents were also told in that they would no longer be to claim reductions in fees the governors if they had two at the school or if their in- had fallen dramatically. The who complained to the udsman had been told by the rnors that fees for his young- son would be reduced by £15 a so long as an older son mained at the school.

A month later he was told that the policy had changed. This change came about when, following substantial losses incurred by the school, Cumbrian council officers questioned the governors' authority to waive part of the fees. They said the governors would have to fund such reductions out of their own pockets.

The ombudsman found that the council was justified in raising the fees over the three years 1975-78 to keep pace with inflation and to make sure there were no more losses. He confirmed that the governors were acting beyond their powers in authorizing the reductions at the council's expense.

The ombudsman did, however, say that the council could have revoked the old policy with a little less haste. "That is a question the council may still care to consider", he said.

Judging is not for us, advisers say

Evaluating teachers is the job least liked by advisers, according to a survey by Bristol University School of Education research unit. But advising individual teachers is regarded as most important. More than 80 of the advisers questioned would like to spend more time on it.

The survey, covering 14 local education authorities, also shows that the advisers average six visits a week to schools, that they have little contact with research and curricular agencies such as the Schools Council and that most of them see their role as a brake upon over-hasty proposals for educational change.

Most comments, it says, indicated reluctance to engage in the evaluation of probationers and teachers, and "even those who were committed to it tended to emphasize the practical problem of devising reliable and valid assessment and interviewing techniques".

Advising individual staff figured in the work of 85 per cent of the advisers and many of them said this was their most important job. But it was time consuming and "too much time had to be spent in the head's study rather than with the teachers".

All the advisers interviewed had visited at least one school in the previous week. They averaged six visits a week of up to three hours' duration. But on a third of the visits the adviser did not meet any teaching staff other than the head.

The survey also uncovered a tendency for advisers to "adopt" certain schools and spend a disproportionate amount of time in them.

There was little support for the view that part of an adviser's job was to keep the schools informed of what was coming out of such agencies as the Schools Council. Nor did they feel any obligation to feed back results to these agencies. In so far as they were involved in bringing about changes in schools, most advisers saw their main role as that of trainer.

More than 90 per cent were engaged in in-service training and 70 per cent spent time on probationer induction courses.

The research team, led by Dr Ray Bolam, says that the development of in-service training together with the growth in the number of people carrying out jobs similar to that of advisers, notably teachers' centre wardens and teacher-tutors, is likely to push advisers towards an evaluative, administrative, facilitating and "training the trainers" role away from advising individual teachers.

"Yet, the project data suggests strongly that a substantial proportion of advisers derive their main job satisfaction from direct advisory contacts with teachers and schools. If this is the case, then the changes may well diminish this group's job-satisfaction quite considerably."

Scouts to set up Asian groups in Slough

The Scout Association has appointed a former scout, who comes from Pakistan, to set up Asian scout groups in Slough, Buckinghamshire, and encourage the boys to mix with other scouts.

The appointment of Mr Mahmoud Ahmad, aged 30, is being subsidized by the Manpower Services Commission, and follows a six-month study into what eight to 14-year-old boys in Slough do in their spare time.

Full integration should be the ultimate aim in race relations, says the study. In the meantime religions and cultures should be preserved.

Union gets more members

The National and Local Government Officers' Association significantly increased its membership in 1977. More than 26,000 people employed in the public sector joined the union between October 1976 and October 1977, bringing total membership to 709,331.

Sport

Too many 'turned off' by school PE

Physical educationists are concerned "about the things which others can't duplicate—bodily welfare of the children and the young, both for the enrichment of their lives at school or college and for laying a foundation of habits and skills to maintain bodily efficiency long after leaving school".

This Mr John Wright, of Nonington College, said last week, was one of the strands whichemerged from the annual conference of the Physical Education Assocition held at Warwick University. "We want to equip the nation to adopt informed caring use of the body and informed caring abouththe body."

Professor Peter Fentom, research physiologist at Nottingham University Medical School, spoke strongly about the significance of physical activity in relation to health, said Mr Wright. He urged physical education leaders to support researchers and doctors in their efforts to understand more about the relationship between activity and health.

Dr Wilfrid Barlow, a consultant rheumatologist, told the conference that "h middle age most adults have lost the pleasure of a finely tuned body and have not been given sufficient help in their schooldays to motivate them to use their adult bodies properly".

Motivation was also the theme of a speech by Mr John Bailey, senior PE adviser in Leicestershire. Various keep fit campaigns, he said, "may be regarded as a rather poor reflection on the efficacy of PE programmes in our schools during the last 25-30 years".

It was evident "that as soon as the opportunity arises many youngsters choose not to engage in any physical activity.

"This suggests that their experiences in school may have 'turned them off' rather than convinced them of the physical and psychological benefits to be derived from regular and vigorous participation."

He suggested a reappraisal of the objectives and content of curricula "with the inclusion of regular work specifically designed to improve and maintain cardiovascular and respiratory efficiency". He also suggested pre-service courses for PE specialists who wanted to teach at primary level.

Sir Walter Winterbottom, former director of the Sports Council, opened the conference with a speech on the social and economic aspects of Sport for All palicies.

Volleyball: Speedwell again

by Stanley Levinson

Speedwell School, Bristol, and Townfield School, Hayes, Middlesex, old volleyball rivals, clashed again in the finals of the schools championships, and for the second successive year Speedwell were the winners.

Speedwell beat Townfield 15-11, 12-15, 15-2 in the girls' Under-19 championships held at the American School, London. They retained the girls' Under-19 title, beating newcomers Sacred Heart School, Harrow, 15-8, 15-5, 15-7. Most of the Speedwell team are closer to 16 than 19.

The Bristol school has had a team in the volleyball finals for the past six years, during which Townfield has also been a major Picardy School, Erith, Kent, won the boys' Under-16 final after a two-hour struggle against Ounsdale School, Wolverhampton. They won 15-5, 7-15, 13-15, 15-7, 15-10.

But Ounsdale, who are regular finalists, did not go away empty-handed. They beat Campion School, Liverpool, another traditionally strong team, 9-15, 15-7, 15-5, 17-15 in the boys' Under-19 competition.

This weekend schools volleyball focuses on the inter-city tournament at Upton, Chester. Next month Speedwell compete in the European schools championships in Bruges, Belgium, and, in June, the Under-15 competition will be revived with the finals in Bradford.

Hockey ups and downs

The English have easily won the home counties Under-19 hockey tournament at Penarth, but the Under-16s disappointed by being held to a goalless draw by Spain in Southampton.

England won all their matches at Penarth. In fact, the tournament was theirs after the second round of matches, which made the final encounter, against Scotland something of a formality.

Even so, they had a comfortable 4-1 win over the Scots.

England's main scorers were: Peter Jones (four), Sean Kerly (three), both at Chatham House School and Jonathan Lee (three) of Sheldon Heath School, Birmingham.

ARE YOU TEACHING TOMORROW'S ENGINEERS?

Britain needs more engineers and PETT aims to encourage more talented young people to take up engineering as a career and to enter Britain's vital manufacturing industry — the wealth making sector of our society.

THE YOUNG ENGINEER FOR BRITAIN COMPETITION 1978

is one way PETT is stimulating interest in technology. Open to 16-19 year old students and apprentices, regional finals are in October with national finals in December presented by BBC TV's Pebble Mill programme.

EXCITING PRIZES FROM INDUSTRY

Trips to the USA and Canada, industrial visits in the UK and Europe, scholarships, cash prizes, job opportunities, trophies, trips to the North Sea and many more valuable prizes have been generously donated by British Industry.

The whiter-than-white world of children's literature

WASHINGTON

The books American parents give their children to read still depict an "all-white world", according to a recent Harvard University study. When blacks are portrayed, the study says, they are depicted according to racial stereotypes.

Research by Professor Jeanne Chall of Harvard's Graduate School of Education shows that only about one out of every seven books published for children has black characters of any significance. Only one in 10 of these books portrays blacks in a modern setting. These tended to be biographies of sportsmen and entertainers. "Historical fiction, fantasy, folktales, humour and poetry comprised a small percentage of books with black characters", Professor Chall said.

Things had improved in recent years, however. Professor Chall and her colleagues repeated a study done in the mid-1960s, sending out questionnaires to 60 publishers belonging to the Children's Book Council and also examining the portrayal of blacks in a random selection of books. While the 1960s study found only about one in 14 books involving black characters, and most of these in historical settings, by 1975 this proportion had doubled.

Professor Chall commented that the books emphasized the traditional image of blacks. "In some of the historical books, the black slaves depicted were characterized as ever high-spirited, smiling and fun-loving. The biographies of black athletes also tended to emphasize their exuberance and joyfulness without also including their serious competitiveness.

"Another stereotype was conveyed by a book designed to teach children the fundamentals of basketball. While there were many photographs of black collegiate basketball players, the photographs which were specifically staged to demonstrate basketball skills included no blacks."

Great Leap back to basics

China's fifth National Congress has stressed the need for students to be both "red and expert." John Gardner reports on the most authoritative rebuttal of the Gang of Four's policies so far.

The return to elitism, which has been apparent in Chinese educational pronouncements over recent months, has been fully confirmed by the recently-convened fifth National People's Congress and a gigantic National Science Conference, attended by over 6,000 delegates.

The congress, which met in Peking from late February to early March, is the first "parliament" to have been elected since the overthrow of the "Gang of Four", the group of ultra-leftists headed by Mao's widow Chiang Ching. Its purpose was to endow recent changes with constitutional authority. Science and educational matters figured prominently.

The congress approved a new state constitution which stressed the goal of complete modernization by the end of the century, and affirmed China's intention of making "major efforts" to developing education and science, and to adopting "advanced techniques wherever possible". All citizens are guaranteed the constitutional right to education and "to engage in scientific research".

On February 26, Hua Kuo-feng delivered a major speech to the delegates, many of whom were described as "intellectuals". He observed that modern science is characterized by the use of atomic energy, electronic computers and space science. Because of the "Gang", however, the gap between China and the advanced countries, "which had been narrowing", had actually widened in recent years.

The quality of education had "fallen sharply", and there was now a grave shortage of trained young people able to step into the shoes of "older experts" who, although he did not mention it, had been trained long before the Cultural Revolution.

Hua emphasized that scientists and technical personnel must take steps to transform the weaker sections of the economy. They must set up nuclear power stations, launch different types of space satellite, step up research into laser theory and its application, attach importance to genetic engineering and, "above all", advance research on electronic circuits and electronic computers. Full attention must also be given to theoretical research in such basic subjects as modern mathematics, high-energy physics and molecular biology. Social sciences are also to be encouraged.

He also confirmed earlier reports that the educational system is to be expanded and improved at all levels. By 1985 a 10-year school system is to be virtually universal in the cities, and an eight-year one in the countryside. He said that "all types" of school are to be encouraged, including vocational and spare-time establishments, but implicitly acknowledged that it is impossible for China to provide good facilities for all, when he emphasized that special attention must be paid to "key" schools.

These schools are, in fact, "centres of academic excellence", creaming off the most gifted children and giving them extremely favourable treatment in terms of libraries, laboratories, well-qualified teachers. Their existence was condemned in the Cultural Revolution when the "little treasure pagodas", as they were known, were vilified for training an intellectual elite while millions of school-age children were unable to go even to primary school.

It was also alleged that a disproportionate number of their pupils were drawn from the families of cadres and intellectuals. Certainly, gaining admission was very difficult and much use was made of entrance examinations, even at primary level. Despite the attacks on them, a few survived the Cultural Revolution and their merits are now being extolled as a way of raising educational standards.

Chairman Hua: morale builder.

In February it was announced that the Ministry of Education had taken direct control of a number of schools to serve as national models, and that others were to be set up under the auspices of local education departments or government agencies which need to train specialized personnel for various types of economic work.

Chairman Hua also urged the speedy compilation of new textbooks, another contentious issue. Before the Cultural Revolution their production was under centralized Ministry control, and schools were forbidden to substitute locally-produced material without permisson from higher authority.

In the late sixties, however, the emphasis changed and teaching material had both to be relevant to local need and to "serve proletarian politics". Because of frequent switches of policy in the early seventies, many training college lecturers were more or less permanently employed in constantly revising textbooks, and many schools were forced to rely heavily on crudely duplicated and unbound "teaching materials".

Chinese delegations to Britain and other countries have shown a keen interest in textbooks and it has been reported from Japan that China has recently bought books ranging from elementary school primers to works suitable for postgraduates. Not surprisingly, science books have been the most popular.

Hua also emphasized that more attention must be given to training more and better teachers. With over 200 million young people receiving education, the quality and quantity of teaching staff is a serious problem. In addition to expanding training colleges and "normal schools" (special schools for training primary school teachers) a number of ad hoc measures, popularized in the Cultural Revolution, continue to be advocated. These include "crash" courses, "on-the-spot" training by experienced teachers, and the "pooling of experience" in group discussion. Television, radio and correspondence courses are being run.

The need to build up the morale of China's intellectuals was another theme of Hua's speech. Whereas the "Gang" had maligned them as "bad elements" on a par with landlords and counter-revolutionaries, Hua asserted that "the overwhelming majority" of them are "devoted to the Party and to socialism" and can be "relied upon by the working class".

This message was reiterated by Teng Hsiao-ping, when he gave the inaugural speech at the National Science Conference in Peking on March 18. Famed as the most outspoken critic of the ultra-left, the irrepressible vice-premier discussed at length the question of being "both red and expert". Repeating a formulation which resulted in his purge in the Cultural Revolution and again in 1976, Teng came close to saying that political purity and professional competence come to much the same thing.

China's need, he said, was for "talented people". He dismissed as an "ignorant, counter-revolutionary clown", Chang Tieh-sheng, a youth who got into university in 1973 by successfully arguing that his record of agricultural labour and political purity should guarantee him precedence over "bookworms" and "college fanatics" who (unlike Chang) had actually passed the entrance examination. The "Gang" hailed Chang as "a hero who goes against the tide" and made him a model for emulation. It is now said that "those days are over".

In fact, Hua and Teng's speeches are significant more for the status of the speakers than for saying much that is really new. As is the norm in China, congresses and conferences that are publicized (and many are not) tend merely to rubber-stamp decisions taken earlier and elsewhere. Certainly, the need to "cherish" intellectuals has been a theme of countless editorials for over a year. So, too, is the admonition that teachers know best.

In 1973 and 1974 the "Gang" caused considerable indiscipline in schools by publicizing several cases of pupils who had been "persecuted" by their teachers, and by urging pupils to resist the "Confucian" concept of the "absolute authority of the teachers". The most tragic case concerned a girl who, it was alleged at the time, had been driven to suicide by her teachers' harsh criticisms of her inability to learn English. Last December a new version was given by People's Daily according to which the girl had been poisoned by the "Gang's" fallacy that "study is useless", and had flatly refused to learn English. Although additting that the teachers concerned had handled the problem "incorrectly", the article stopped just short of saying that the tragedy was largely the girl's own fault.

Job prospects bleak for leavers

from John Richardson

THE HAGUE

Eleven per cent of last year's school leavers are still looking for jobs, according to official figures recently released. This represents a total of 23,000 young people, including 1,099 trained infant teachers who left college while still under the age of 23.

Much of the youth unemployment results from the world trade depression, according to Mr S. H. A. M. Kruse, deputy director-general for employment at the Dutch Ministry of Social Affairs. Mr Kruse identified two groups with particular difficulties in finding jobs: those with no formal qualifications, and those with only lower level technical and social work diplomas.

Qualified teachers now make up the largest single group of unemployed college leavers over the age of 23. Among last year's leavers there are nearly a thousand still out of work, although they have higher qualifications in either technical or social and cultural fields.

Dissatisfaction is now being voiced in both educational and industrial circles at the inefficiency of the linkages at the interface between the formal education system and the world of work.

The growth of academic courses in schools, colleges and universities, at the expense of vocational types of training, has in recent years added to the youth unemployment problem, according to the Dutch Federation of Businesses (roughly the equivalent of the British CBI).

It outlines three main reasons for the mismatch between school and industry. First, education is providing the school leaver with an increasing number of qualifications which do not fit the requirements of commerce and industry. Second, industry requires people with qualifications which the education system does not provide. Finally, as a result of their education, many school leavers have inflated expectations and refuse jobs which they are capable of doing and which the economy needs done.

Australia

from John Kirkaldy

SYDNEY

Australian schools today devote less time to teaching the creative arts than they did in the 1960s, according to a report by the Schools Commission and the Australia Council. The report recommends that the arts should play an increased role in the country's schools.

Art subjects are now often regarded as "soft options", "a waste of time" and of no career advantage, says the report. It urges that the arts should become once again curriculum subjects.

It says that 20 per cent of teaching time in primary and junior secondary schools should be devoted to the arts and that all arts subjects should be given equal status with other subjects for matriculation purposes and for entry to a wide range of tertiary courses.

The report also recommends that practising artists in all branches of the arts should be brought into schools as instructors. Republic of Ireland

Church blocks expansion of community schools

from John Walshe, Dublin

The Irish Education Ministry's plans for the provision of community schools have suffered a severe setback with the announcement by religious orders that they will not participate in any further such schools because of what they regard as the unacceptable conditions laid down for their involvement.

A second announcement to the effect that new-style Catholic second-level schools are being considered for the Dublin archdiocese has even more far-reaching implications for the development of Irish second level education.

The Education Minister, Mr John Wilson, is to have discussions this month with the religious in an effort to salvage the remainder of his community schools programme. Meeting the demands of the religious would, however, spark off a strong reaction from the teacher unions.

Community schools are designed to bring together the separate traditions of Irish second level education: the private secondary schools with their generally academic curriculum and the local authority technical/vocational schools which specialize in the more practical subjects.

The Education Ministry is already in trouble with the Dail's Committee of Public Accounts—the Irish parliamentary public spending watchdog—over the non-collection of the local contributions from the religious and local authorities (TES, March 17).

It was originally suggested that the religious and local authorities would pay 5 per cent of the cost of the first group of 30 community schools. It is now proposed to raise this to 10 per cent each for the next group of schools, but the religious have said this is too much and they are not willing to pay it.

Their other objection to future participation in community schools stems from the fact that the Minister wants to change the Deed of Trust for the second phase of schools. In the original deed, drafted with the approval of the former Education Minister, Mr Richard Burke, the religious had reserved places on the teaching staff. The local Bishop also had virtual powers of hiring and firing teachers of religious knowledge, and the board of management was to consist of two religious, two parents and two local authority nominees. Mr Wilson wants the reserved places dropped from future schools and teacher representation included on the board of management.

The secretary of the Episcopal Commission on Education, the Reverend Con Sayers, who is also education spokesman for the Dublin archdiocese, where the bulk of the new community schools are planned, has said that without reserved places the religious cannot be assured of continuity of participation and they will not enter the schools.

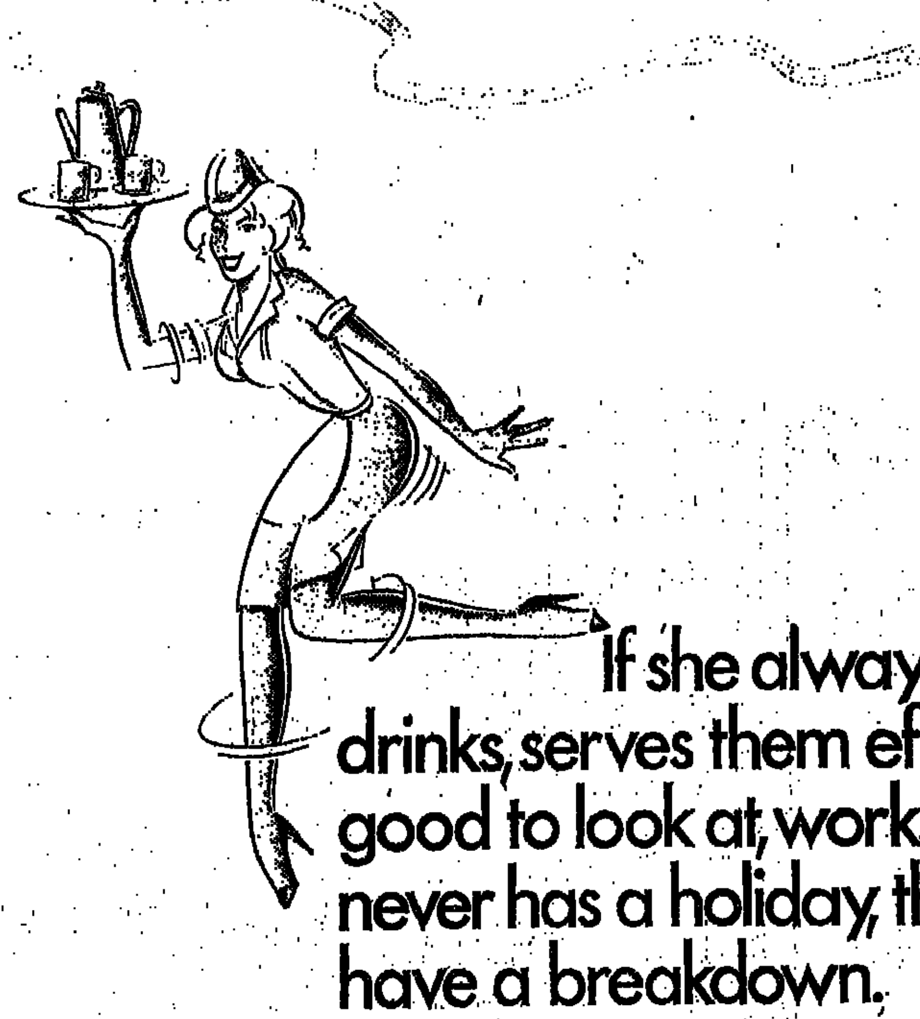
There are indications that the Minister is willing to reduce the local contribution demand to the original level of 5 per cent each. But if he continues with reserved places for the religious, he will incur the wrath of the two second-level teacher unions who want all posts open to competition from lay and religious teachers alike.

If the religious go ahead with their decision not to take part in further community schools, the Ministry's plans for the provision of around 60 such schools will be in jeopardy. There is no doubt that without the involvement of religious these schools will be less acceptable to the majority of parents.

Coupled with the announcement of the threat to further community schools came the disclosure that new-style voluntary Catholic schools are under consideration—at least for the Dublin archdiocese. It is envisaged that these schools would be under diocesan patronage, have a lay principal, a board of management and a predominantly lay staff.

It is also hoped that they would attract the normal 80 per cent grant for new private schools, and the usual capitation grants and payment of teachers' salaries. The exact number of these new schools would depend on their demand, and on the level of financial support from the parents.

Until a month ago it seemed that the future development of Irish second-level education would consist of a continued merger of private and public interests into community schools, and that the only new private schools would be replacement of old buildings. Now, suddenly, all is changed and uncertainty has returned to the Irish education scene.



If she always makes top quality drinks, serves them efficiently, is clean, tidy, good to look at, works 24 hours a day and never has a holiday, then she'll probably have a breakdown.

Chances are that when it comes to a drinks system, you'll want it to be reliable.

A system that doesn't have off days, or days off.

So you'll be interested in Maxpax.

Maxpax works on the unique 'in-cup' system. Quite simply this means that the coffee (or any other beverage) is already pre-sealed in the cup.

All the Maxpax machine has to do is to eject the cup, then deliver the hot water at the press of a button.

Which means there are fewer components in the machine. No intricate plumbing or complex electronic wiring. Hardly anything to go wrong.

Leaving you with a neat, easy to maintain and reasonably priced machine.

And the drinks themselves? They're fresh tasting and delicious. Because they're made from the finest Maxwell House ingredients.

The snakes and ladders of grades and percentages

Sir,—I am grateful for Scott Archer's reiteration that Grade 4 should represent pupil 50 out of 100 school population though the Grade 4 band itself has some width and it is not clear whether pupil 50 should be at the top, bottom, or middle of the Grade 4 band.

For over a year I have been asking at my school, and CSE meetings, how the South Eastern CSE Certificate Grade 3 and better, has been obtained by 60 per cent of the English candidates, but by only 45 per cent of the mathematics candidates. This discrepancy extends over the last 10 years, and I can obtain no answer to my query.

LES HARTRIDGE,
Mathematics Teacher,
74 Devonshire Way,
Croydon, Surrey

Sir,—M. Scott Archer (letters, March 24) has misread Examinations Bulletin No 1.

The CSE examination is designed for the top 60 per cent of the population subject by subject. It is quite possible for someone to be in the bottom 40 per cent in some subjects but in the top 60 per cent in others. Moreover, concentration on a limited number of subjects may allow a less able candidate to reach the same standard as another candidate of somewhat greater ability who is taking a wider range of subjects.

The designing of the CSE for the top 60 per cent of the population and the fact that 83 per cent of school leavers attain at least one CSE or GCE grade are therefore quite compatible and in themselves do not show that the standards of the CSE examination have slipped.

School lunches: how to face both ways

Sir,—So we now have the spectacle of a body of public servants refusing to see that kids are fed on the grounds that they have no parental responsibility, while at the same time assaulting any kids who complain on the grounds that they have full parental power.

Bearing in mind Kipling's celebrated remark, might one conclude that the flagsters of the teaching profession have even more in common with the Ladies of the Night than one had imagined?

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENTS

WHO NEEDS TO LEARN?

HOW CAN YOU TEACH HOW TO LEARN WHEN YOU DON'T KNOW HOW TO LEARN?

★ How well have you learned this year? How useful is your learning to you? Or did you stop learning years ago?

★ How well do you teach? Every teacher can recognize when learning conditions are effective and when they are not, but few learn about the factors behind the difference.

Failure to perceive the structure and process of learning means that teaching how to learn becomes following a syllabus. Learning how to learn for oneself is the essential purpose of education, and teaching how to learn is the essential responsibility of teachers. Yet educational debate dwells more on problems of resources, curriculum, teaching aids and techniques than on the more basic problem of for teachers who see the fundamental nature of this problem and its urgency now. Learning is treated from the point of view of the whole individual, not just the intellect.

Theoretical presentation will be subordinate to a varied range of activities chosen to foster insight arising from participants' direct experience of learning. The weekend is to be of practical use, not an academic talk-in.

Location will be in London unless sufficient applications permit a residential base in Gloucestershire. Cost: £25.

A mistaken view of social workers?

Sir,—I was deeply disturbed by reading the article on the National Association of Social Workers in Education conference in Blackpool ("Flexi-time for more fulfilled pupils" April 7). I had been under the (mistaken, it seems) impression that social workers tried, in whatever sphere they worked, to improve social conditions, so that in education, for example, they would aim to remove all the obstacles to a child's proper education.

Occasionally a school might have to overlook a girl missing part of her schooling, while she helped at home. For schools to actually give approval of this, however, would in my view be very wrong. It gives respectability to the view that a girl's education can be sacrificed for the sake of a bit of housework. I notice that older boys have not been awarded the same "privilege".

Even more disturbing was the conference decision to support the withdrawal of family allowances and child benefits from parents whose children persistently play truant. This would serve to increase financial problems in the family, hardly something I would have expected social workers to advocate, since truancy tends to go hand-in-hand with a difficult home background.

Furthermore, no mention was made of just how the parents are supposed to ensure that their child attends school.

The causes of the child's reluctance to attend school should be examined, and the elimination of these causes made the aim of those involved. We want children to be learning while at school; their mere physical presence is a waste of time.

When integration fails

Sir,—It does not seem profitable or desirable to defend the need for separate special schools with a series of generalizations, assumptions and half-truths similar to those that appeared in your recent articles concerned with the integration of handicapped children in the normal school system (April 7).

I only hope that cautious counsel will prevail before any decision is made to "phase out" schools that are committed to the education of the handicapped. There must, surely, be an available alternative to mainstream provision that will enable parents and children who have unsuccessfully experienced ordinary schooling for a number of years to benefit by admission to a special school.

Our own experiences suggest that the more obvious results of such a transfer are:

The immense relief felt by parents—who feel that the special needs of their children are, at last, being successfully recognized and developed in a suitable educational environment.

The new willingness of children to attend and react to school, often for the first time, with positive interest and enthusiasm.

The easy relationships that parents are able to establish with the special school and the resulting mutually supportive role of home and school. This will be, for many parents, a novel experience.

The progress in basic skills made by children who have previously achieved little in this area during three to four years of normal schooling. (These will range from simple self-help needs, e g toileting and dressing to the more traditional skills required for literacy and numeracy.) Is it sufficient for the normal school to have "coped" with the child for this period?

These benefits are valuable and are highly regarded by handicapped children and their families and they must continue to be available. The abolition of special schools, or their grudgingly continued existence with a greatly reduced role, could be a positive disservice to many children, parents and the community.

We ask, only, that we are allowed to continue our work without feeling the need to resist generalized attack from "integrationists" who seem to believe that their case can best be made by belittling and undermining the achievements of special schools, their dedicated staff, developing children and caring parents.

Small is not so beautiful in the sixth form

Sir,—With local education authorities urgently preparing for a reduced intake into secondary schools from next autumn onwards, the danger is that the reduction will be distributed equally among all schools, good or bad. On this point there appears to be an unusual unanimity between Labour authorities with a radical yen for sixth form colleges, Tory supporters with a nostalgia for smallness as a virtue in its own right, and the National Union of Teachers seeking to prevent any decline in the number of teaching posts.

This will mean denial of parental choice in favour of popular schools with thriving sixth forms, and the diversion of their children to less popular schools with less chance than before of building up viable sixth forms. The even spreading of the decline in numbers will jeopardize sixth forms now able to offer a wide variety of subjects, and set up pressure for them to be phased out in favour of sixth form or tertiary colleges, at considerable extra expense, and with uncertain educational results.

A case in point (TES, February 10) is the London borough of Hackney. Hornsey School for Girls, with 1,427 pupils, and a successful sixth form of 257, is threatened by a Labour authority, enjoying some Tory support on this point, with reduction to possibly 900, and the eventual loss of its sixth form to a merger with other schools or a tertiary college.

Educationists of all political persuasions should understand the case for the optimum in size of schools and of classes, particularly sixth form classes, rather than sacrificing efficiency to smallness. This may mean that some comprehensives will have to close, and their premises used as tertiary colleges, in areas where there is no hope of viable sixth forms in any of the schools. But let us not reorganize out of existence the good sixth forms which have done more than anything else to persuade seekers of high quality in education of the merits of the comprehensive system.

Need to craft a balance between output and demand

Sir,—The proposal by the Engineering Industry Training Board, apparently endorsed by Mrs Shirley Williams, that schools would be asked to provide some of the apprenticeship training as part of the normal curriculum is an exciting prospect for pupils in those schools which are able to recruit and retain teachers of craft.

Shoreditch College currently produces over one fifth of the total national output of craft teachers and our evidence proves conclusively that the current shortage is acute. My prediction is that a balance between output and demand is unlikely to be achieved by measures which the DES has imposed on colleges training teachers of craft (now known as design technology). During last May, June and July the college was inundated by telephone calls and personal letters from head teachers, often needing two or more design technology teachers for each school. Our 120 leavers were in the fortunate position of being able to choose where they wished to teach.

The current shortage is probably over 1,000 teachers (an HMI's recent estimate) divided equally between existing and "frozen" posts. How is this to be met? Shoreditch was notified by the DES that it could enrol 80 students for initial training for design technology in 1978 to produce an output of 65 in 1981. Head teachers who may want a trained design technology teacher in 1981, or earlier, might make a start by putting red carpets in their workshops or alternatively ask the DES to allocate more places in colleges with a proven record in training teachers of design technology.

Winners and losers in Kent

Sir,—In his letter ("Why heads are confused about lunch breaks", April 14), Mr Hart claims that the NAHT took and won a collective dispute with Kent on the issue of keeping schools open.

He must know that this is completely untrue. The fact is that when the county education officer was told by the Kent Federation of Head Teachers' Associations that some misunderstandings were occurring as a result of the original letter, we very willingly agreed to issue a clarification. We did this because we place the greatest importance on [illegible] good relations with [illegible] in Kent. I think it very unfortunate indeed, therefore, that Mr Hart should have made this highly misleading statement.

Personally, I hope very much that the NAHT is not now going to be run on narrow legalistic lines. If it is, there can be no doubt that the association will itself be the principal sufferer, but that the entire education service will be the loser also.

In case Mr Hart has any illusions on the matter, it is clear that the authority's policy had very considerable support among the public of Kent, who of course actually pay for the education service.

The elegant approach to computer confusion

Sir,—I am confused and concerned about the attitudes to mathematics and computer studies shown in the discussion papers "Curriculum 11-16". Item nine of the 20 attitudes, concepts and skills to be acquired during mathematics lessons is to "know enough about computers to have no irrational fear of them, and have an appreciation of how logical processes are applied to the manipulation of data" (p25).

Only mathematicians would claim to know which fears (about computers) are rational and which are irrational—the rest of us argue about the problem. But the HMI also believe that mathematics contributes to aesthetic education "... by searching for the elegant solution to a problem" (p24). I, and many others, would like to know how to recognize this unique, elegant solution, e g, which of the many solutions to the problem of proving the equality of the base angles of an isosceles triangle is the elegant one.

I seriously doubt whether mathematics has much to offer to a discussion of people's fears about the loss of individual privacy by the large scale storage, retrieval and manipulation of personal information by computers. Which branch of mathematics gives advice on the best way to organize society to take account of the changes in employment in terms of hours worked, job satisfaction, increased leisure and changing educational requirements?

How does mathematics help to explain the fiasco of the Vehicle Licensing Centre at Swansea? How does it reassure people that all large systems will not be similarly awful?

These matters are all part of computer studies, a subject in its own right, which is rapidly growing in terms of exam entries and national importance. It is too important to be given the same status as a part of mathematics as item 15, "to be able to read and understand clocks and other combinations of dials" (p 25).

Perhaps mathematics teachers really are discussing these problems in their lessons and this might explain why so few pupils could do simple everyday calculations in the tests set by the Institute of Mathematics.

N and F going off the rails?

Sir,—You have reported Dr Clifford Butler, former chairman of the committee which recommended the N and F pattern of examinations for degree aspirants, as having advised universities to "be flexible in the way they operate the system. Instead of three subjects at Normal and two at Further level, medical students could perhaps be expected to cope with three Fs two Ns. Other variants would be four Fs with one O level or three Fs, one N and one O level".

These views are fundamentally at variance with the committee's report which recommended (para. 207) "that no course requirements should demand more than two subjects at the Further level. We see some advantage . . . if departments could limit their named Further subject demands to one—or even none".

In my note of dissent appended to the main report, I pointed to the probability that competition for degree places in the more popular subjects "will result in a norm of more than two Further level subjects . . . This would have undesirable consequences upon which my colleagues and I are in agreement".

A five-subject sixth-form course with four Fs and one O level seems an entirely new concept which falls outside all the trials and subject committee reports recently published by the Schools Council. Nor does it offer the slightest assurance of an intrinsically "broader" course than a three or four A level one.

This is but one further small element in the growing evidence about the difficulty and undesirability of introducing a two-level five-subject course.

Contracts versus common sense

Sir,—I am facing a dilemma—the lack of one English teacher in my department. A common problem no doubt, but what is particularly exacerbating in this instance is that we did have a teacher at the end of the Easter term, who apparently is now unemployable—as far as my school is concerned at any rate. He will be out of a job (which he very much wants) and we shall be without an English specialist for the third, fourth and fifth year groups that he had every intention of teaching.

A contradiction in terms, at least in terms of common sense. However, because this teacher (qualified with a BEd but previously without employment), came to us with a contract from the l.e.a. for one term only it now appears that there is no way in which he can be offered further temporary employment without the authority "taking the risk" of engaging him, whether they wish to do so or not, as a permanent employee. If, that is, there is the possibility of a job going in the English department on a permanent basis. That is certainly a possibility—the way I feel at the moment there may well be more than one permanent job coming up for sale.

We were both told that this ludicrous position was "unfortunately the case" the day before last term terminated. I was permitted a five-minute session with the headmaster at the end of the lunch hour, before returning—with the teacher whose job has just receded rapidly from sight, to conduct CSE oral examinations for the rest of the afternoon. I like to think that our ability to concentrate on the job in hand was not impaired.

Even though this teacher accepts fully that a renewal of his contract for one further term would be temporary, even though he is willing to apply in the usual way for a permanent job, even though he is willing to come back on supply and not on a contract at all, he has been told quite categorically that he cannot return in any capacity, on the grounds that even one day back in the school at the start of the summer term will put him in a position, so the county says, to claim unfair dismissal, if he so wishes.

I would like to point out that:

- Because he has now begun to know his classes, he is in a much better position to teach them effectively than a third new temporary teacher will be able to do;
- If another qualified English teacher is not available, his classes will be further deprived by non-specialist baby-minding.
- As the head of the department, with a full teaching timetable of my own, I shall be quite incapable of filling the gap effectively (how can I, when relationships with their own particular teacher are part of any effective teaching/learning situation?);
- Here this young man will be, on our doorstep, without a job, having just started to find his feet, only to have them kicked from underneath him;
- If l.e.a.'s are prepared to treat professional adults as totally untrustworthy, how can they in return, expect their employees to behave in a responsible "over and beyond the call of duty" manner? I believe that the readiness of teachers recently to operate sanctions, has something to do with this kind of mistrustful attitude.

I am informed blandly by my own union, the NUT, that there is no case to be brought. I shall leave the NUT forthwith. I am informed by the headmaster, and by the Area Education Officer that nothing can be done—the law is the law (my dear) so stop kicking against the pricks.

Will youth work endure?

Bernard Davies believes that the rise and rise of the Manpower Services Commission means youth workers must drop their mystifying community labels, and reassert the specialist nature of their jobs

Chris Winn

For at least four decades, informal adolescent education outside and beyond school has been provided by "the youth service".

This rag-bag of voluntary and statutory agencies has operated almost exclusively through leisure-time facilities which, the Albemarle Committee decided nearly 20 years ago, should concentrate on "association, training and challenge". During the sixties, these were consolidated into sometimes quite attractive programmes, of "social education", emphasising the development of both "interpersonal skills" and "citizen responsibility".

Today such "youth work" is undergoing fundamental change. New organizations — most quite different from existing ones — are taking over key youth service functions. Resources are being reallocated.

In the process important new strategies are being established. The effect of all this for traditional youth workers can be confusing, especially since the deeper causes and effects of the changes are often difficult to discern.

Like all such social provision, youth work has always contained hidden intentions pursued by more or less subtle and mystifying methods. The idea that it is primarily about "getting kids off the streets", for example, though often rejected officially, has never lost its public appeal, nor for that matter its hold on some policy-makers. (One councillor is reputed to have said of the Albemarle Report: "We're not paying for fun"!).

Indeed, the report itself had clear, social control themes running through it: the committee was after all set up primarily to consider what the youth service could do "in assisting young people to play their part in the life of the community". Other constituent organizations were—and are—even more open about their social control intentions.

The chances of these organizations achieving such ends in their cruder forms have never been good. True, in a generalized way, the youth service has contributed to taken-for-granted beliefs about a society built on consensus and therefore deserving its citizens' ultimate loyalty.

But such a marginal and incoherent set of facilities could never hope to get large numbers of energetic and often alienated young people to remain law-abiding, avoid premarital sex, enjoy Bach rather than Abba—and do all the other things demanded of it.

After all, it has no central direction—the DES and its predecessors have repeatedly refused to suggest any common philosophy or national policy. It is extremely loosely knit, with voluntary bodies and local education authorities having no obligation to cooperate with each other—or among themselves.

It commands a tiny fraction of the education budget, and has probably been disproportionately hit by the economic cuts. And it has—even after a decade and a half of "expansion"—only about 3,000 full-time fieldworkers, and would almost certainly collapse without its quarter of a million volunteers and part-timers.

None the less, though there has never been much prospect of the Youth Service achieving many of the purposes thrust on it, post-Albemarle faith in it has until recently survived in spite not only of a continuing rise in juvenile crime, but also of often hysterical "moral panics" about drug-users, mods, rockers and skinheads and other facets of teenage culture.

Thus, some state resources have continued to be provided—since Albemarle, over £30m has been spent on capital projects alone—while comment from governments of both parties has generally assumed it could still help prepare the country's youth for (given) adult roles.

All the signs now are that this support is ebbing away, and that state-sponsored youth work will in future be carried out under very different auspices, by very different methods—and probably for some very different reasons.

In some ways the service has connived at its own downfall. Since the 1969 Fairbairn-Milson report Youth and Community Work in the 70s, it has increasingly converted itself into a youth and community service, or even a community and youth service.

Occasionally this has been liberating, as when youth workers have tried to meet young people on their home ground rather than just within buildings. Generally, however, the drift to "community" has meant spreading already limited resources even more thinly to cater for age groups across the board.

Perhaps not surprisingly, therefore, the state is now reducing its support for education-based forms of youth work. LEA youth officers—now often retitled community education officers—are complaining that adult literacy schemes and other traditional kinds of adult education have become far more attractive to their superiors than "unproductive" youth activities

Recently, too, the DES tried to jettison its responsibility for grant-aiding voluntary organization building projects, most of which lead to the erection of youth clubs, scout huts and similar premises. The department's review of the youth service, initiated nearly three years ago, has now clearly run into the sand, after producing only an advisory "forum" of interested bodies.

If, then, the state is quietly giving up the youth service, where does it assume youth work will be done in the future? In particular, which agencies does it now see as carrying out essential social control functions among out-of-school and post-school adolescents?

Two other sets of institutions have increasingly taken on youth work roles. One —perhaps the minor partner—may be best described as social welfare. Overall, this is no more coherent than the youth service.

None the less, in local and central government's growing (if rather contradictory) interest in both "intermediate treatment" and "closed" residential units for very disturbed and disruptive adolescents, it is possible to distinguish new and significant forms of youth work.

The most committed advocates of intermediate treatment complain—as youth workers have always done—that their's remains a cinderella facility. However, David Ennals, as Secretary of State for Social Services, has recently given it strong backing (including some extra money). Local authorities are now appointing, not only specialist I.T. organizers, but full-time I.T. Field Workers too.

The welfare approach remains a relatively minor one in comparison with the other new arrival. This addresses itself very directly to youth employment—or, rather, unemployment—and is of course being administered by the Manpower Services Commission. Initially, its impact on youth work was through existing youth service agencies, as youth organisations discovered that, via its Job Creation Programme, they could get extra staff in particular.

Now, however, MSC is moving much more directly in to "youth work"-type provision, a trend which seems certain to gain momentum. MSC is clearly intent on becoming the dominant partner in a comprehensive education and training service for all 16- to 18-year-olds.

For youth workers brought up on tiny budgets, MSC expenditure plans are nothing short of staggering. In a full year, for example, over £14m will be available for community service schemes, plus a proportion of £8.5m for a "capital contribution" and a further proportion of £2.6m for staff for local areas (all at 1976 prices).

In addition, over £14m will be spent on "project based work experience" and £12.5m for community industry schemes, some of which may well end up looking very like youth work as previously practised within the youth service.

Though the MSC's proposals do make gestures to "the needs of individual young people", it eschews vague commitments to social education. It is understandably much more concerned with the needs of the economy—with, for example, job training, work preparation and developing basic skills.

Underlying all this, as with so many current pronouncements on youth unemployment, is the fear that, with so many young people passing through a crucial developmental stage virtually uninfluenced by state, or state-approved agencies, a major social problem is looming.

We seem to be facing a situation very similar to that which, in the last third of the nineteenth century, helped to produce, not only full-time compulsory schooling, but also youth movements like boys clubs and the Boys' Brigade. Because we have an unacceptable number of adolescents neither at school nor work, we are having to contrive new youth agencies better adapted to provide social initiation and control.

Here then is a significant social policy initiative, commanding substantial resources and involving a new strategy of work. The strategy is particularly noteworthy because it is shifting the focus of youth work from leisure to work.

This in itself could be helpful, since youth service workers have always overestimated the importance of recreational activities, and underestimated the impact of the labour market and the experience of labouring on young people's lives.

But does not such a strategy deserve greater public debate, especially when it alters the balance of aims within youth work? For, though the social control functions of youth work have always existed, within these constraints youth workers have been able to exercise some discretion. They could and did offer some young people the kind of personalized service which, within the new agencies, seem certain to get a low priority.

It is true that large bureaucratic agencies like the Manpower Services Commission, or even social services departments, are still not able totally to control their functionaries. The signs are that a proportion of these people may anyway be drawn from the ranks of conventional youth workers, who will carry with them some of the more progressive traditions of their origins.

For example, increasingly in recent years students coming off the two-year youth and community work courses have not gone into youth clubs. Insofar as they have concentrated on youth at all, many have rather preferred social welfare posts, including those concerned with intermediate treatment. Now the director of the National Youth Bureau is urging that at least one youth worker should be employed in each MSC area to help administer the commission's community service programmes.

Nonetheless, both the "welfare" and the MSC approaches seem bound to place more emphasis on direct, even coercive, kinds of control, and to leave far less room for personal growth and collective activities among young people.

Youth workers will not contend with this threat to the more progressive elements of their work by leaping back into the old boltholes of youth centre, scout hut and the rest. The rather nasty world of the late 1970s is already calling for some radical responses—that is, the world not only of chronic youth unemployment, but also of widespread school refusal, racial conflict and adolescent homelessness.

However, to do this, youth workers will also have to overcome their loss of faith in the specialist nature of the job to be done, and reassert themselves as youth workers, unencumbered by mystifying community labels. If they do not, their traditional and relatively flexible powerbase—such as it is—seems certain to disappear.

Keeping them short

Michael Duffy suggests the secondary curriculum is not flexible enough to cope with the widely differing skills and abilities of pupils

It is fashionable to suggest the secondary curriculum is over-loaded. Schools offer too many courses, we are told; in pursuit of the false gods of consumerism and choice and relevancy, the basic skills are being neglected, standards eroded. A common core is counselled; a Green Paper defines with splendid imprecision our curricular objectives; a DES circular invites us to review our "curricular arrangements".

A certain scepticism is, perhaps, in order. It may or may not be true that "standards" are declining. Until we define what we mean, our exam system cannot tell us. It may be that there is, in the back-to-basics movement that is gathering pace here and in the United States, a shrewd awareness that some recent course offerings on both sides of the Atlantic have been hasty in construction and flabby in execution—particularly perhaps the inquiry-based courses, of which it has been said that the syllabus is what it turns out to be in the end.

The slogans, however, are misleading, and the current trading in them may be concealing the real weaknesses in our curriculum: that it does not satisfactorily define what it is that is taught and learned; that it does not sufficiently differentiate among the widely differing skills and abilities of pupils; that it is not flexible enough; that it is not capable of being accurately evaluated and assessed.

Few of us would dispute that English, maths and science should figure in the curriculum of each secondary school child: but what precisely have we said? What are we saying if we concede that these "subjects" should figure therein more prominently than they do now? What do we mean by "more English" or "more maths"? Do we mean that more children than now must struggle in increasing bewilderment through the CSE maths syllabus, for the dubious benefit of a grade 4 at the end of it? Or that those who do that now must do it for more of their time?

I am interested in the American parallel: not least, in the fact that if you read the course programme for the ninth and tenth grades of an American high school, you will find little mention of English, maths and science, as "subjects". The Dallas school system, for example, offers 16 courses in English language and literature at this level, but all of them are precisely defined, ranging from "basic reading, spelling and dictionary skills" to "oral and written composition, including research skills". There are 18 courses in mathematics, all defined in relation to the mean grade level, complete with a flow chart to show the options open at the end of a particular course.

This is definition of the sort we need if we are to answer the question "What should we be teaching?" in any professionally respectable way. It is also, very strikingly, differentiation. Too often we talk about the curriculum as if it had some sort of independent existence outside and beyond the children to whom it is taught, forgetting that we can define it accurately only in terms of the particular children for whom each item is designed.

"Too many subjects" is a tempting cry when we are struggling with our option groups and blocks: but what does it mean? Too many subjects for whom? American courses are, of course, shorter; and Dallas is a big city, astonishingly diverse in its racial and social background. But an English comprehensive school is a place of considerable diversity as well, and though I would not suggest it should model its provision on that of Dallas (or even that Dallas is typical of the United States), I believe its curriculum should reflect and provide for the great variety of abilities and requirements that will exist within it.

Unless we assume that abilities and requirements are fixed and unchanging, they pre-suppose a certain flexibility in our arrangements: a flexibility that we often fail to provide, largely because of the extraordinary influence that our 16-plus exam system exercises in our decisions. This would not matter so much if the exam system (or its projected replacement) could do the things that could reasonably be expected of it, such as defining and evaluating the curriculum, defining levels of attainment, identifying specific skills, providing a range of employment qualifications, earning exemptions from subsequent exams.

But the examining system does none of these. Designed originally to examine a high grade curriculum followed by a minority of able pupils, and extended subsequently to cover an enlarged but loosely defined curriculum taken by most pupils, it manages to turn even its strengths into weaknesses. There is no doubt that it enabled the old secondary modern schools to raise their expectations and those of their pupils by a considerable degree. But in the process we allowed it to expand over more and more of the ability range. Particularly in Mode 3, it enabled us to devise new courses and confer upon them academic respectability.

But the more courses we legitimized, the more we discriminated against the remainder, so that even physical education and outdoor activities and preparation for parenthood came into the fold, and more and more of the curriculum was affected. In a sense, indeed, the whole curriculum was not only affected, but determined, for in most schools it is now locked into the framework that the system demands—typically, a grid of eight subjects, each of which is studied for the last two years of compulsory schooling. No possibility of changing courses in mid-stream; no valid mid-course evaluation; no results even till after the jobs are won or lost.

If it is objected that there is nothing alarming in this, that it has always been the case, then my point is made. The changes that we are seeing, in this year of the Manpower Services Commission, the revived N and F proposals, the massive school-leaver unemployment, demand a more flexible response. In the context of N and F, for instance, we really ought to be wondering whether two years of chemistry is always to be preferred to, say, one year of chemistry and one year of physics.

The present structure limits choice too severely, at a time when there are already other powerful factors at work in this direction. The rationing of money and staff forces us to fill option groups to capacity, involving a good deal of "guided choice" in the process. Falling secondary rolls will have the same effect, and there will be pressure particularly on the minority subjects. There will be talk of grouping schools into consortia in the name of the rationalization of the curriculum; though the simplest rationalization of all is expressed in the formula eight courses for two years = 16 courses for one year = 32 courses for half a year —or any combination of these.

It also assumes a false equivalence between courses, presupposing that a given grade in one subject is as valid or as valuable as a similar grade in another. What is the difference between a grade 1 in social studies and a grade 1 in outdoor activities? Who would blame an employer for neither knowing nor caring to find out?

The attempt to maintain equivalence leads to padding. Essentially practical courses are stiffened with an often artificial and repetitive academic content—partly to give a respectability that is irrelevant to their purpose, partly because we are still bedevilled by the academic/non-academic dualism.

Padding is a device to lengthen courses, to make them fit the Procrustean bed of the examination. Yet shorter courses with limited but visible objectives are often more effective. Two years is a long time for a 14-year-old, and even clever fifth formers often find the last months of their course desperately tedious.

Shorter courses would lend to the curriculum the flexibility it lacks. No subject need suffer: the most demanding courses can be expressed as a set of modules to be studied independently or in sequence, and the new structure would enable us to provide for many activities that in the past were extra-curricular, but which present conditions are tending to diminish.

We could safeguard choir and orchestra and drama workshop—and transform the increasingly difficult area of physical education. We could cope more easily with our mid-year transfers, and we could free the 14-plus option stage from its awesome finality. We would have room, also, to include areas such as study skills, computer education, political education in its broadest sense, that are still widely neglected.

Shorter courses would enable us to define content more clearly, to make our stipulations more precise, and to differentiate more realistically among pupils' differing needs and capacities. They would allow us a means of assessment that would be both simpler and more constructive, in that it could define a level attained or a competence achieved, much as do the music grade examinations.

And they would lift, from us as well as from him, the burden of teaching Billy Bloggs every Friday afternoon for the next two years. A small price to pay for the enrichment of the curriculum.

Retrogressive step?

Tim Albert visits a successful community education centre whose future is threatened

Spitalfields is the kind of place which grinds down not only the people who live there, but also any initiative to try to improve their situation. Set just outside the City of London, its proximity to the docks has made it for centuries the preliminary settling ground of the recently arrived immigrant: first the East Anglians, then the Huguenots, Irish, Jews and, more recently, the Bengalis.

Now, as it presumably has been for centuries, it is still an area of poverty and depression, of bad housing and precarious livings, with austere Victorian school buildings and the more modern slabs of municipal housing as symbols of successive failures to "improve" a place where a successful resident is still one who has managed to get away.

In this context, the past history and doubtful future of the Montefiore Centre is quite understandable. Operating through the youth service of the ILEA, the centre has been trying to bring education (in an informal, broad sense) to the people who have hitherto found nothing of value in education (in a formal, narrow sense).

Over the past few years it has been quite successful, but at the moment it looks as if the influence of the area is likely to catch up with it. The neighbouring Robert Montefiore School is faced with a rapidly falling intake, and one of the proposed solutions is to merge it with the more successful centre. But that, say centre supporters, will effectively destroy all that the centre has been trying to do.

The history of the Montefiore Centre dates back to 1970, when the local primary school moved away to purpose-built premises down the road. The ILEA gave permission to various community groups—a youth club, a group for mentally handicapped children, a senior citizens' club and a pre-school playgroup—to move into the now-empty premises, and in 1972, following a marriage between a new ILEA policy of community involvement and local pressure, the place became a Community Education Centre.

It was not a painless birth. The first warden became ill shortly after taking over, and for several months the centre was in the charge of a variety of tutors from the neighbouring Bethnal Green Institute for Adult Education, a much more traditional institution.

In 1974 Bryan Merton, a former school teacher and community worker, took over, and though he decided to move on last July, his influence is still very much in evidence. David Cheetham, also a trained teacher who was the deputy director, is now acting director. He says that the basic principles have not changed, though there is some consolidation and reorganization.

"People in an area like this have had a long and bitter experience of finding education irrelevant because they have so far failed in it," he says. "So we try to make education accessible to them by offering a programme of educational and social activities to the whole community, without enlisting formal procedures like fees and selection.

"By acting as a community centre we hope that we will become relevant to local people. Then, by encouraging them to make use of our facilities, to start running things themselves and to have representation on the management of the centre, we try to give them the confidence that their experience of education has so far failed to do. It's education at a basic level—learning skills."

This is done through social events and clubs, through special workshops, through various community services and through the management committee. The original groups still meet regularly, but there are also adult literacy sessions; classes in English, Urdu and Bengali; family workshops (run by a qualified domestic science teacher); drama and communications workshops.

The facilities are used by groups producing a community newspaper, by a ceilidh band, spiritualists, snooker players and a Bible study group. There is a food cooperative which enables elderly people to buy small quantities of food at reasonable prices, and a community transport scheme with three minibuses.

There is also a brightly painted cafe on the first floor, where you can get braised steak and two veg for 40p—less if you are a pensioner. "This all fits in with the grander pattern of education, because the people who use these facilities are able to identify their own needs and start organizing things themselves", David Cheetham says.

Full-time staff consists of David Cheetham and a caretaker. But there are a number of part-timers: the leader of the local council is the tutor-in-charge for administration, and there is another tutor-in-charge for the workshops. There are part-time tutors for communications (one specializing in photography and video, the other in printing), for the family and theatre workshops, for adult literacy, as well as several part-time youth workers, canteen staff and cleaners.

David Cheetham says: "When I first came to the area in 1973 there was a very very low level of community organization and a heavy reliance on professionals for providing social services and meeting local needs.

"It's still very dificult to measure success; after four years we are only beginning.

"But things like the Spitalfields project and the Montefiore Centre have assisted in the development of a representative community organization in the area. There have also been significant achievements on the part of some individuals who have now moved on to some kind of formal education or professional training."

But all of this could be ruined by the threat to merge the centre with the nearby school. The current ILEA report on the matter notes that the school, where Rhodes Boyson was once head, has seen its September roll drop drastically from 699 in 1974, to 490 in 1977. In addition there is a growing proportion of non-English-speaking pupils, and a falling proportion of girls.

The answer, says the report, is either to keep the school, though in a smaller form; to close down the school completely and transfer the children to other schools in the area; or to merge the school with the centre.

Debate still rages, and a decision is not expected immediately. Meanwhile David Cheetham and his colleagues are fighting to maintain what they see as the future of their venture: "The attitude of the users is that they would be uneasy about merging with the school, about having to transfer from this building to a facility buried in a secondary school nearby. It would not be so easily identifiable.

"I also have personal reservations as to whether we would be as informal and as flexible, and also involve the community in management, if we became part of an organization like a secondary school. Yes, I do think it would be a retrogressive step."

Members of the community join in one of the Montefiore workshops.

A touch of class

Heather Neill talks to Nigel Williams, whose play about classroom life in the raw has been widely acclaimed by teachers and critics

Nigel Williams has never taught in a comprehensive. Nor in any other secondary school, for that matter.

This must come as quite a shock to any teacher who has seen his play, Class Enemy, at the Royal Court Theatre, and recognized there the lads, their language, their attitudes, their articulacy, their recalcitrance, and their awful desert of a classroom. Teachers have been known to sit stunned for a good 10 minutes afterwards, so well do they know this place and its people; while school kids have assured the disbelieving "it really is like that".

It would be possible to say quite a lot about the successful 30-year-old playwright Nigel Williams, his career (after public school and Oxford) as a director at the BBC and as a novelist, his pleasantly chaotic house in desirable Barnes complete with charming wife and baby. But to him that would all be irrelevant in this context. "I'm not important. It's not even the play, but the issues the play is about".

How does he explain his uncanny ability to penetrate "a South London comprehensive" and put 5K so convincingly on stage? Ironically, the answer is that he got to know such kids, what they feel and how they talk, when they were playing truant. Until recently he lived in Brixton, and became friendly with some of the local lads for whom school no longer had anything to offer, but who had nowhere in particular to go.

The spur to write the play, which was clearly produced in a headlong rush of emotional energy, was the collapse of a project on which his wife, Suzan Harrison, was working in South London. She and two colleagues were examining the relevance of the curriculum to the community in which schools find themselves. Funded by Shelter and the Schools Council, they had been making cassettes with school children among the local people when the money supply dried up.

Nigel Williams sees society's unwillingness to spend money on education as the central issue underlying his play. More money spent might mean less wasted potential. It sounds a simple equation—too simple, perhaps—but the play itself is by no means simplistic.

Class Enemy concerns six fifth year boys who spend a whole double period waiting for a teacher. An ineffectual master makes a couple of brief appearances, but these boys are not his responsibility, and anyway the school has given up trying to do anything constructive with them.

To pass the time, they each give a lesson, under the direction of Iron, to whom they look out of fear and respect, as a leader. Iron (all the boys are known by their nicknames) is the enemy of the title; he is at war with the rest of 5K, and with his own social class.

Sweetheart, all frothy fair hair and sharp suits, the wow of the disco, is first. His chosen subject is, predictably, sex. His attempt is greeted with derision: "We don't want facts", says Iron, "give us knowledge". And that is the recurring theme of the play; these boys, who feel themselves abandoned by the system, and have, in turn, rejected it, seek a vaguely defined, but highly desirable commodity called knowledge.

Lessons follow from Racks on gardening, from Nipper on how "the blacks done it" (though he does not apparently see his black classmate, Snatch, as one of them), and from Snatch on his speciality, smashing windows. The two remaining boys, Sky-Light and Iron, have been spoiling for a confrontation from the beginning, Sky-Light resenting Iron's bullying while he sneers at the other's concern for feelings. It turns out that Sky-Light's parents are blind, so his is a practical cookery lesson.

Iron's subject is self defence, and the inevitable fight develops. But there is no gratuitous violence in the action; it is the aggressive language (four-letter words are constantly repeated) which some teachers might find objectionable, and which might prevent the play reaching other youngsters. But anyone who has taught in such a class will recognize the authenticity of the dialogue; the swear words cease to be significant in themselves even for school kids in the audience who might at first be tempted to giggle.

When we met, Nigel Williams said he believes the makeshift lesson is probably an experience shared by many which reflects the way people tend to ape the system they know. It is, in its way, an optimistic play, he says, since, despite everything, the thirst for knowledge has not been quenched.

He was delighted by the production, and especially by the performances from the young actors, all professionals who have worked with Anna Scher's company but are not long out of school themselves. To the possible criticism that, accurate or not, the language should not be condoned by an educated adult in an entertainment, he says that presupposes such kids are monsters, already beyond the pale.

Is the play intended to be about individuals and their predicament, or is it a general statement, even propaganda? Nigel Williams says we should feel sympathy for the individuals, but that there is a constant tension for him between the imaginary and documentary elements.

Is the play fair to the teacher? "I have enormous sympathy for him. He's a guy who's had a hard day. These boys are not his responsibility." (At this point his wife cut in to say that no teacher would ignore the aftermath of a bloody fight, and he admitted that he had perhaps over-simplified this.)

Can a play change anything? "I think it can change people's heads a bit."

Class Eremy is a pamphlet play that packs an extraordinary emotional punch. Nigel Williams has attempted to show honestly the predicament of a portion of the school population which rarely has a chance to speak for itself.

A climactic moment from Class Enemy.

Class Enemy runs at the Royal Court Theatre, London, until April 29.

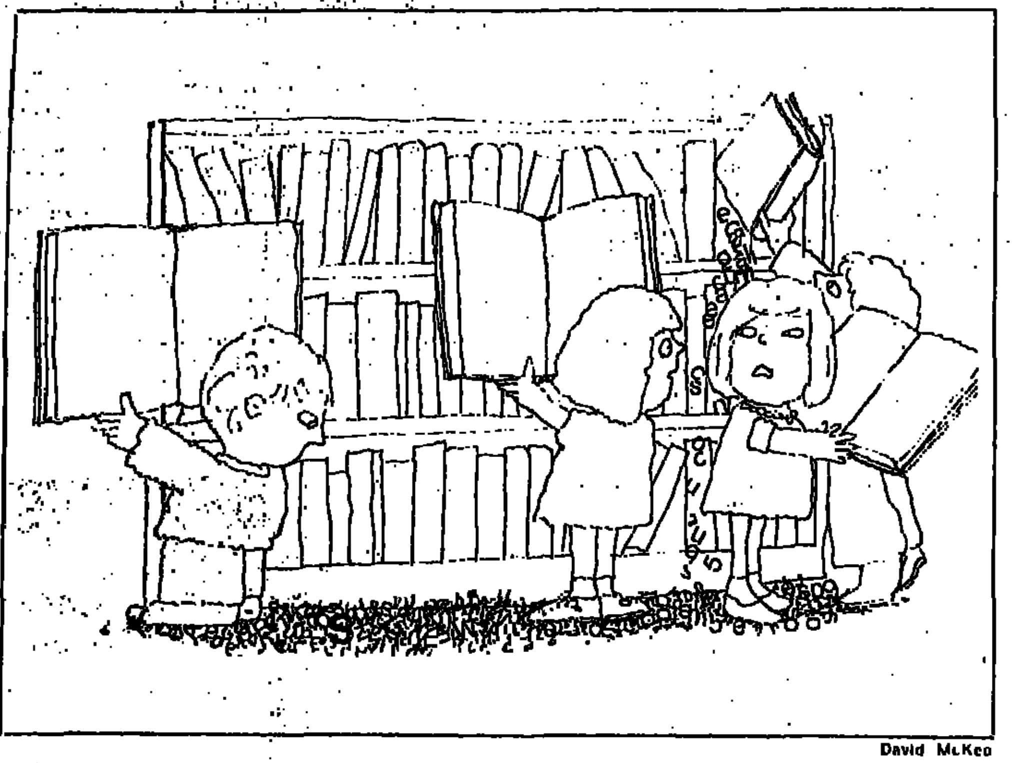
More matter, less art

Margaret Spencer writes an open letter to the Educational Publishers' Council



David McKee

Dear Mr Secretary,

Everyone with any sense is worried about the provision of books in school. Money is so tight, and competition for it so strenuous, that if pupils actually get the books they need, it will be the result of publishers and teachers, you and me, deploying the kind of skills needed to play a game like Ulcers. As we're both involved in the game of getting the books to the pupils, yet, again like good gamesmen, operating independently, may I write to you about the troublesome case of non-fiction books?

The books I mean are used in school to offer pupils information, comment and speculation about the actual state of the world, past and present. (We'll have it out another day about workbooks.) In them the discourse takes for granted some continuity between what's in the book and what's in the world. In primary schools the "topic book" is what I have in mind. In the secondary school it's the "course book" or whatever stands-in for the old textbook. May I discuss the books as if we, the teachers, always used them well? You and I know that books don't always get the treatment they deserve, but it helps if we presume the best about each other.

Unlike children's fiction, topic books have never had the quality of critical attention they need and deserve. All these ranks of books in series, the same old pictures, the quasi-fashionable subject matter (is it Jaws that has spawned so many books on sharks this year?), the repetitious nonsense about dinosaurs, the stereotyped production, and above all, the abysmal linguistic poverty of the prose, are these really offering a means of knowing something?

[illegible] partly because the [illegible] notion that children learn by pursuing an interest, has been made into an educational cliché. Publishers have made available the resources that teachers believe they cannot devise for themselves: design teamwork and photographic expertise, so that mountains, molehills and the Mid-West become accessible. Libraries become bright and cheerful places to copy in. You look us in the eye and say, "We have put the world of knowledge into manageable packages, slices off the total joint in thickness according to age or preference". You have had your reward. The proportion of non-fiction to fiction books in school libraries is 4 to 1. In a primary school I know, out of 1,700 books, 400 are story books, the rest non-fiction, with 200 titles from a single series—guess which.

I can't expect you to be uneasy about this because most teachers aren't moved by it. They find one-off lessons, well-presented, with wall charts and follow up work. Here are all the paraphernalia in their best teacher-proof form; a neat learning pack to be tapped for facts and copied from for projects, playing, as Michael Butor says "the same role in the process of consumption as food stuffs". Are we simply getting what we ask for?

Primary school topic books are nearly all about beginnings. They assume ignorance as a starting point. They carry some facts, but [illegible]. The unit of knowledge is the caption under the picture. Teachers are seduced by them because, young as teachers mostly are, they can't be experts on everything and they haven't yet solved the bigger, real problem: what are children to know, what are they to be taught and how? The area of curriculum studies, where the notion of topics originates, is a battlefield. Imagine a Schools Council project on the non-fiction book. After English and mathematics, what? Victorians, Tudors, ports, mountains, plants, butterflies? The answer in present book form is, "a little of everything but nothing with volume (which was an adjective before it became a noun). If the teacher and the children have a low common denominator of information, what can be challenged, where do significance, worth and relevance arise?

You have given the primary schools books so smoothed and synthesized by adults that the reader never makes contact with the excitement of discovery. The raw material has been organized in someone else's head. The generalizations arrive ready-made, the conclusions are drawn, the speculation is unnecessary. How can children learn to ask questions if you offer them only answers? Readers cannot make their own way through these topics; the route chosen is always the writer's.

All of this is equally true in secondary schools where the pack rules. The piecemeal handout of the hastily-devised worksheet has a published counterpart in colour supplement style. Just before the cuts caused us to look twice, we had lots of books that stood up to one reading only by one child. In slinging out the old books of exercises (and isn't there a rising swell for their return—don't listen) you have [illegible] tional journalism which collects the fall out of your specialist books for adults. History, for example, comes in cramped paperback summaries for the multiple copies that are carried in satchels for swotting, or all those picture books of children, houses, machines and crops through the ages. You are acting in good faith and responding to requests for diversified "resources" for the mixed ability classroom. But the model of the book as a film still with a caption is wrong. To choose and produce books simply for their relevance to examinations or for the dubious pleasure of not reading, is something other than education.

Supposing I were to propose the production of books not to remedy teachers' weaknesses but to strengthen their strengths, what then? We'd have to give up books that let others define what we teach. We'd have to stop looking for crammers based on examination papers. But if we did that, would we be sure to find an author who wanted the young to share his excitement in his subject to become his apprentice? If there were such a writer—and I think there are some—what would his chances be in, say, biology, against the ranged forces of Nuffield?

Or what chance has a teacher/writer who wants to assume, rightly in many cases, that his readers have some kind of expertise? Are there books for young experts on your lists? How do you actually see the thousands of new readers every year who do not come to knowledge from books but from doing? To become readers they have to learn how book knowledge is related to action knowledge. Having learned to read they are dismayed that their expertise is valued at the level of their reading skill. So they value reading, even when hard won, even less thereafter.

Then, would you support a writer who saw, as a rare few do, that a book promotes learning as a reflexive activity, a "coming-to-know" by means of a dialogue between the author and the reader? How do you see the reader's share in that when you examine the writer's prose? The challenge for secondary school readers is to lay their experience alongside that of the author, to reflect on both so as to reduce meanings. So many textbooks offer dead facts as thoughts that think themselves, not real experience in real language. Compare the realm of children's fiction where individuality and style are prized. Who knows the names of non-fiction authors, even last year's TES prizewinners? As their books are the province of the middleman, the author never rises above journeyman status.

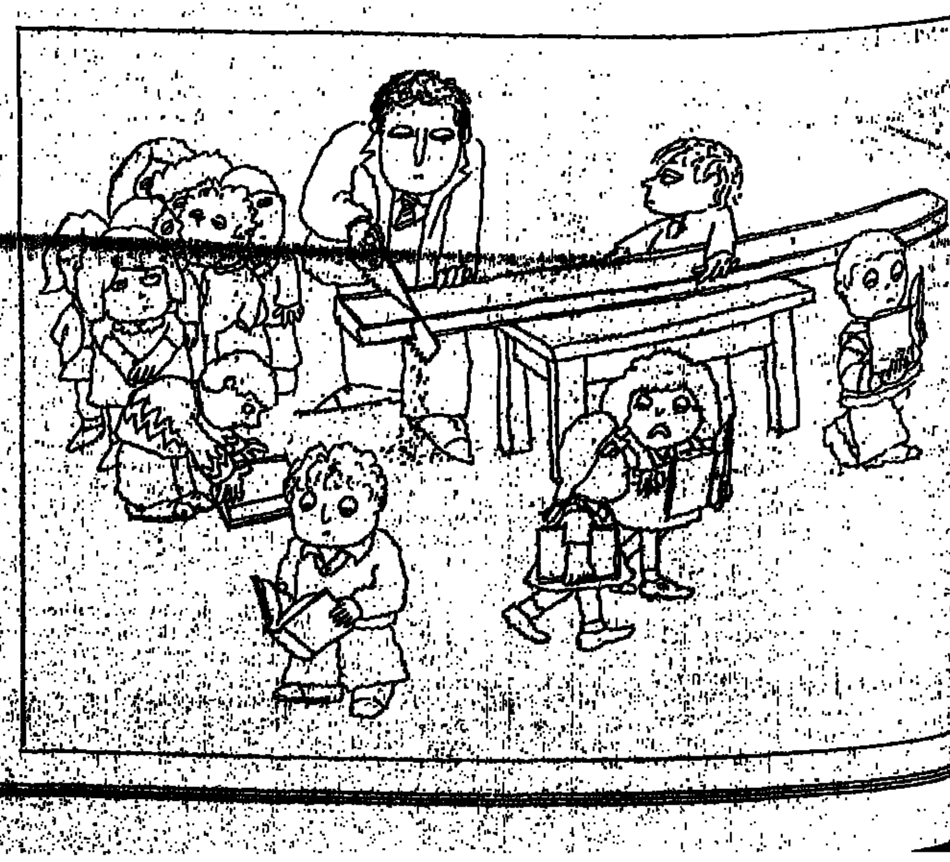
What would happen, do you think, if you were to ask the real historians, the dedicated geographers and biologists to write directly for the young? Could you interest someone to see as his audience the 12-year-old who wonders if there will be cars and petrol when he is 17? When did you last read your texts on the Industrial Revolution? Do you ever wonder if the inefficiency claimed for girls in maths is related to their class books? I will pay for this harangue by suggesting three things, and these are less than enough because I want to keep your generosity in the choice of what is available. What must change is the link between the learner and the author and the teacher and the author. The author can not address the pupil and the teacher as if they were the same person.

My first suggestion may be capable of only limited generalization. As a school subject, classics has all but disappeared in the form in which it was once taught and learned; but classical studies have lively books because teachers, editors and experts asked the real question: "What must we keep?". The queues at Burlington House for the Pompeii exhibition had something to do with a series of books which begins, Caecilius est in horto.

Second, a question to make a proposition: what would a book written for the young by a real expert look like? Only indirectly related to exams, I guess. The text will look less simple but be more engaging. The author will make his line clear but never write down to the readers he hopes to make into his successors. The topic will be seen in a particular rather than a general light. Ideas will come with facts. The teacher's book will not be the pupil's book and the experience of both will be related to the task in hand so that the teacher is also a learner. The experience and knowledge of the readers will be matched with the experience and knowledge of the expert. To see just what can be done and what pupils are capable of if truly involved, look at the examples of work reported in the Schools Council Working Paper No. 59, Talking, writing and learning 8-13. There you will find ideas for books that help children to reflect, learn, enhance and extend the excitement of ideas generated in the world outside school. Such a book "transforms the way we know and inhabit the universe", says Michel Butor.

You won't like my third suggestion, but I make it to all teachers too. Reading schemes of all kinds cost too much. We could buy a shelf full of real books for the same money.

If we try some of these things we could turn the disadvantages of the present résumé tions into the advantages of critical evaluation of what a book is really worth in terms of a child's learning.



Music hath charms...

Robin Maconie

The Psychology of Music. By John Booth Davies.
Hutchinson £8.95. 09 129500 9.

Most books on the psychology of music are tedious affairs. Since the subject is inconclusive, research cannot be properly judged, and it follows that any attempt at a general introduction for a non specialist readership is bound to be mainly a résumé of experimentation which, to the musician, often appears patently ill-informed. The test of a psychology of music is whether it explains what musicians already know, and furthermore, whether it throws light on real music about which we may yet be undecided. Psychologists themselves often lose sight of music in their search for meaning.

John Booth Davies's new book comes as a refreshing surprise. It is one of the most stimulating and readable texts on the subject to have emerged in recent years, combining a richly detailed knowledge of past and current investigations with a degree of critical perception and sardonic wit the subject badly needs. Dr Davies is a musician, a practising pianist and trumpeter whose affection for jazz reveals itself in anecdote of a somewhat improvisatory kind; but this is far preferable to the usual type of psychologist whose grasp of music is sober, rudimentary, and defensively patronising. In fact, The Psychology of Music does a valuable public relations service for the discipline, and manages to convey both an excitement for the study and a hope that eventually it may lead to more definite conclusions.

One consequence of the author's candour is that it gives a musical reader courage to react in a similarly critical spirit. This is both useful, since one should not have to be intimidated into accepting the literature's jargon and preconceptions without comment, and because, for all its virtues, the present book is by no means free of error. For instance, a discussion of research into music in industry (Muzak) fails to point out the inconsistency of asking workers to evaluate background music that by definition is not consciously listened to, since conscious attention makes them do less work, not more. The importance of peripheral awareness, though repeatedly conceded, could be more strongly advanced as criticism of the traditional question-and-answer approach.

Again, investigations into pitch perception, and into consonance and dissonance, frequently lead as reported to speculations of a bizarre and mystical kind, when the evidence could have been explained or at least qualified, by greater awareness on the part of exprimenters of the makeshift nature of most Western tempered pitch relationships. It is simply a fallacy to presume exactness of pitch from the spurious exactness of conventional notation, and one wishes for more work to be done on earlier notations such as plainchant, which do not give rise to the same misconceptions.

The conditioning effects of concert attendance, reproduced in experiments in which the subject sits still and listens to a piece of music, also tend to be ignored. When one is sitting still, emotions aroused by music have to be called up from memory, whereas an audience free to move can more actively determine the physical coefficient on which an emotional response certainly depends, and by which it may spontaneously be recalled. Trying to match "tunes" with "emotions" simply won't do. The author's overlong discussion of recall (which he calls the "Darling, they're playing our tune" or DTPOT phenomenon) falls into this trap and overlooks some more obvious environmental considerations, for example that we listen to loudspeakers differently from live performance.

To the observation "people seek to organize tonal sequences into Gestalt patterns" one is inclined to retort that people rather seek to proceed from general regularities (eg of instrumentation, direction, pulse) to particular differences, thus from the static to the dynamic. Most music is indeed composed in such a way as to lead the listener through such a process, and one only wishes that it were more often consulted.

Again, though the author may find it senseless "to try and determine if a person had a good sense of relative pitch by playing him the sound of a motor-bike ... and then asking him to name the pitch of some tone", it does not seem so to me, if the sequence were reversed. Or has he never heard of "tuning a motor-bike"?

There are other slips: it is not Helmholtz, but his translator Ellis who dwells at length on strange multiple-temperament keyboards, the music example from "The loveliest night of the year" is wrong, and other music examples could be better set out. But the overall impression the book conveys is of a most welcome grasp of the subject's salient issues, directness and conciseness of presentation, and above all, an eagerness to engage in dialogue. This last will recommend the book to uninitiates, and help to stimulate a mutually profitable exchange of views.

The place of the amateur

Tony Cline

Personality Description in Ordinary Language. By D. B. Bromley.
Wiley £9.00. 471 9943 X.

"Psychology purports to offer a scientific understanding of human behaviour. But everyone—not just psychologists—needs some understanding of this kind to survive at all in everyday life. As the professionals learn to their cost, everyone is an amateur psychologist. Predictably, when the science was young, its experts turned their back on amateur knowledge, but gradually the commonsense psychological perceptions of the man in the street have become again a respectable subject of study.

In Personality Description in Ordinary Language Dennis Bromley argues that in examining models of personality this is in effect an essential first step which has too long been neglected. The many elaborate models, novel terms and strange notations used in the professional and scientific study of personality have no meaning aside from an infrastructive of commonsense observation and ordinary language. Often, in fact, the jargon can be translated into ordinary language without much difficulty.

In the history of other sciences, such as chemistry and zoology, developing an adequate taxonomy of basic phenomena has been a crucial step in facilitating later major theoretical and empirical advances. Perhaps because of the pressure of urgent clinical concerns psychologists have not been concerned much with this fundamental task in relation to personality study.

One important investigation, which historically led to a current tradition in personality assessment, was Gordon Allport's classic study of trait names. Bromley subjects this paper in an early chapter to a detached and damaging critical analysis. He rejects the restrictive focus on trait description which has characterized so much earlier work in this field.

The core of his own contribution in this book is the presentation of a system for analyzing personality descriptions in everyday language, which offers a wider set of concepts within a clearly argued theoretical framework. "Internal", "external" social and other aspects of personality are differentiated into 30 sub-categories on the basis of an analysis of personality decriptions from a large sample of adult subjects in the Merseyside area. The details of this empirical analysis are not given here. The reliability of the logical and semantic categories will need vigorous testing, and it may prove difficult with such complex material to achieve acceptable standards of reliability. But earlier research has too often taken easier options only at the cost of conceptual triviality.

Later chapters examine the possible application of this approach in various areas. A general theory of personal adjustment is presented in a framework that would allow for the coordination and integration of narrower and more specialized models. A method of individual case study is developed in which what Bromley calls "quasi-judicial" rules of argument discipline the deployment of evidence. Finally he examines characterization in fiction, perhaps over-generalizing his approach but, certainly drawing attention to some interesting implications it has in this context. As he points out at the end, some psychometric approaches to personality study have had too dominating and restricting an influence. This book, along with recent developments in the field, suggests that psychology is at last shrugging off that influence.

Behaviour and Misbehaviour: explanations and non-explanations. By Nigel Walker.
Blackwell £5.00. 631 17810 4.

No author who offers a summary of his book for the express purpose of aiding the hard-pressed reviewer can be all bad. It is perhaps a measure of Walker's confidence in his topic and treatment of it that he does so. One thinks of many books where an adequate summary would relieve the reader of further concern with them.

Behaviour and Misbehaviour is not one of them. It puts forward a cogent and well-reasoned argument on the role of explanation in the study of human behaviour that runs counter to many received views in the social sciences. The limitations of positivist explanations of human behaviour are made clear and many of the alternatives are also shown to be unsatisfactory. The argument is subtle and wide-ranging and not readily summarized. One important strand running through the argument is the status of narrative explanation. This is seen as one kind of genuine explanation which is logically distinct from scientific explanation. Walker points out that both positivists and anti-positivists ignore this form of explanation despite the fact that it is in frequent use and is logically defensible in appropriate circumstances.

He draws on a distinction made by Dray between "how-possibly" and "why-necessarily" questions. Particularly in historical inquiry we are frequently asking "How was that event possible?" rather than "Why did it necessarily occur?" Walker keeps this distinction but amends it by talking of likelihood rather than necessity; even in the physical sciences probability explanations are all one can usually hope for. So the distinction is between likelihood-explanations and necessity-ones. Another way of putting it is to argue that the essence of a scientific explanation is not its logical structure but its demonstration, "why the explanandum was inevitable or highly probable", whereas a narrative explanation "tells why the explanandum was not impossible".

If events can be explained in different ways a number of implications follow the application of the social science disciplines to the study of human behaviour. This is particularly the case with deviant or unexpected behaviour. (Walker is not talking about deviance as commonly understood but about "misbehaviour", behaviour which is in a carefully specified sense surprising.) Such behaviour is by its nature likely to be susceptible only of a narrative explanation.

A satisfactory explanation of the Watergate burglary would trace the sequence of events in a logical way and show how it was possible for them to occur. One might draw on psychology, sociology, politics, to illuminate the necessary conditions for it to have taken place, but not to list the sufficient conditions; we would regard as unreasonable a questioner who wanted to know why Watergate had to happen.

If unexpected behaviour cannot be explained in a scientific way, if its occurrence cannot be attributed to definite causes, practical action must be viewed in a different light. Take law-breaking, for instance, as one kind of misbehaviour. One can only hope for a limited reduction in law-breaking by "tackling causes" if many instances of law-breaking are not susceptible of causal, scientific explanation. Moreover, any general theory that seeks to explain crime in terms of unitary causes is essentially reductionist and misguided.

This book is like a breath of fresh air amid writings on the philosophy of the social science. There are defects: some topics are dealt with summarily with no indication of their controversial nature; a substantial number of references are either incomplete or omitted from the reference list at the end. These are defects, however, which are gladly endured for the sake of a sensible and accessible discussion of some of the central issues in the social sciences.

Cycles of violence

Judith Trowell

Web of Violence. By Jean Renvoize.
Routledge and Kegan Paul £4.95. 7100 8804 3.
Families and Family Therapy. By Salvador Minuchin.
Tavistock £2.90. 422 76300 4.

Jean Renvoize in Web of Violence draws together the strands that show how violence perpetuates itself from one generation to the next—a cycyle of violence linked to the cycle of deprivation. She draws on what research studies there are, and points out where none exists, giving a clear account of the present state of knowledge about domestic violence.

Most of the book is taken up with battered wives, but the author is too preoccupied with the split between National Women's Aid Federation and Erin Pizzey's Chiswick Women's Aid. Her clear preference for the latter is dealt with in more detail than is necessary. She discusses fairly and sympathetically the problems of battering husbands.

The section on the state of the law, is clear and helpful, drawing attention to the present state of bias in favour of men, commenting on the defects and deficiencies, but also offering hope for improvement. Devoting a chapter to Granny bashing is a good way of drawing our attention to an area that we choose to ignore; it is becoming an increasing problem that society must face.

The section on child abuse is clear but brief and does not do justice to the present full state of knowledge. It seems to ignore the important standard work on The Abused Child [illegible] Martin and his [illegible] findings on the emotional damage suffered by battered children which persists when the battering ceases. Her comments on the role of the police—still a controversial issue—and on whether there should be a national-at-risk register, were balanced and fair.

Jean Renvoize is perhaps at her best on prevention. She makes it clear that the cycle of violence can be broken if we can enable our children to have the "good enough" mothering they need. She sees the important implications of the research work on the early mother-child relationship, and also emphasizes the proneness to depression in young mothers at home with children. Above all, she concludes, we need better education of our young people for marriage and parenthood so that an unwanted child does not start the cycle on another turn.

This is not a profound book, but an attempt to understand and explain the violence in our society; Jean Renvoize gives us an easily digestible account of present knowledge on a subject that must concern us all.

Salvador Minuchin is a well established family therapist whose book Families and Family Therapy has already become something approaching a standard text. Now available in paperback and hence possible to buy and keep, it will give many more workers struggling to practise family therapy the opportunity to have access to his concepts and experience.

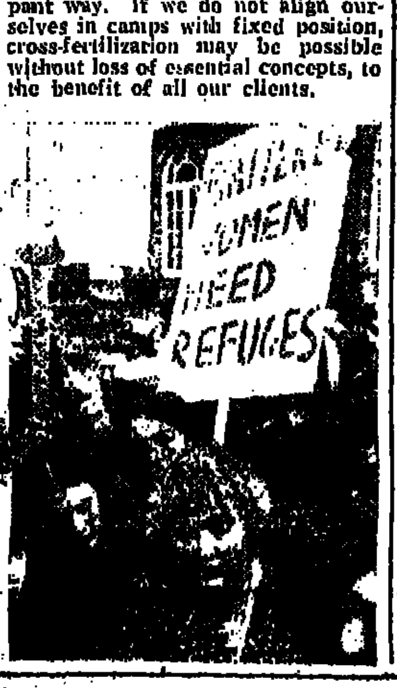
Minuchin's structural family therapy uses techniques that alter the immediate context of people in such a way that their positions change. The changed relationship between a person and the familiar context in which he functions changes his subjective experience. Structural family therapy is a therapy of action. The tool is to modify the present, not to explore and interpret the past.

A family is seen as a system that operates through transactional patterns. There is a power hierarchy and mutual expectations, so that the system maintains itself; subsystems emerge, and these, like the family system have boundaries. Families are subjected to pressures from within due to growth and development of their own members and from external forces. The family chooses or is brought for therapy because pressure has produced stress; almost inevitably there is an identified patient.

Joining is the operation where the therapist positions himself as leader; the therapist having established a diagnosis of the problem, makes a contract with the family and the work of family change begins. Every therapist uses his own personality and preferences in the effort to restructure the family. There are ample excellent examples of the methods of working and explanations of the therapist's activities.

As someone concerned with psychodynamic theory and therapy and with the belief that change occurs in individuals and families through increased awareness of the past on a cognitive and effective level, my method of working is to concentrate on facilitating this, and in this way the effect of the past on the present can be more fully understood, worked through and resolved using the transference.

But the work of Minuchin has undoubtedly drawn our attention to the value, at a time of low resources and high demand for help, of time limited, intensive work in the here and now with families in distress. We need not look askance at therapists who work in an active participant way. If we do not align ourselves in camps with fixed position, cross-fertilizarion may be possible without loss of essential concepts, to the benefit of all our clients.



An overstated case

Frank Coffield on deviance theory

Delinquent Fantasies. By Patricia Morgan.
Temple Smith £7.50. 8511 7116 8.

I have been expecting this book or something like it for some time. It is a reaction against what the author calls "the fashionable muddle of deviance theory" and her targets are the New Criminolgists, the Labelling Theorists and those "suave academics" who "deny in effect that street thuggery is real, remarkable or wrong". Their insistence that deviant and criminal behaviour is best viewed as meaningful rebellion is held to be responsible for "a vast and widening gulf between the views of the public on antisocial behaviour, and the views of the intellectuals and professionals, not to say the politicians. . . ." The attack on these "neo-Marxists" is driven home hard and no punches are pulled; for example, "Within academic institutions domination is frequently acquired and maintained, as I and many others have seen, by the gross bullying and shaming of students into acquiescence."

The psychological and sociological theories which underpinned the Children and Young Persons' Act of 1969 are examined and found wanting. The logical conclusion of this argument is not evaded in any way: "We do not need any adjustments to the Act or the provisions of 1969; they need dismantling. The last thing which will help us is the full implementation of the Act; we need its repeal."

What is one to make of this rumbustious and provocative approach? First, Patricia Morgan hits a number of targets spot on, and she would probably be surprised at the number of suave and not-so-suave academics who agree with her. To take one example, she makes splendid use of Cornish and Clarke's study of residential treatment and it effects on delinquency. Their work compared two very different ways of dealing with delinquent boys—the more "traditional", approved school approach and the "therapeutic community". Briefly, it was found that both regimes were equally ineffective in reducing the incidence of the boys' delinquency. In other words, the "therapeutic community" does not provide us with a panacea for delinquency. For once, the author can be charged with not asking the inevitable question: if both major forms of residential treatment are so ineffective, why do we not close them down, as the training schools have been in Massachusetts?

In similar vein, she makes a very trenchant analysis of the claims made by John Bowlby and others for a connexion between maternal deprivation and delinquency, an analysis with which readers of the author's earlier book Child Care: Sense and Fable will be familiar. These topics and others (the catharsis theory of aggression, the current emphasis on play for young children, the concept of psychopathy) are treated in a sensible, down-to-earth way and in a style which has a sharp cutting edge.

Having said that, however, I was still left with the feeling that the case had been overstated, and the polemical stance overdone. As illustration, the Scottish alternative to Juvenile Courts, the Children's Panels, are dismissed as failures. No mention is made of the large body of work which is highly critical of the Juvenile Court; and nowhere can one read that one of the reasons for introducing the new scheme was that some 95 per cent of the juveniles who appeared before the Court plead guilty.

Why is there no detailed critique (of the kind to which Bowlby and others are subjected) of the growing literature on the Children's Panels? Could it be because most of that literature is highly supportive of the idea? Instead, the argument is made to hinge on one article which set out to assess the strengths and weaknesses of the new system in Scotland and, even then, a conclusion is drawn which nowhere appears in the original. It is this lack of balance which detracts from a book which has so many other worthwhile points to make.

Glad to be gay?

Rowland Berry

Homosexuality Re-examined. By D. J. West.
Duckworth. £12.00. 7156 0935 1.

In our time, when every man is his own medical expert, and psychiatry the hobby of millions, in no field is the educated person so unknowing as in the study of the homophile. Many, who should know better, seriously believe that male homosexuals are either effeminate or child-molesters, that they do not like women, and that they are all interested in bottoms.

Dr D. J. West, in his important work Homosexuality Re-examined does his best to cast cool light on the facts, and does it very well. His original work Homosexuality was published in 1955, and it has now been re-written, following new research projects, legal and social change, and the emergence of the Gay Liberation organizations.

There are some facts which have been known for some time but not widely enough. Sexual preference and sexual behaviour do not necessarily correspond. Transexuality, in which the affected person feels trapped in the body of the opposite sex, is not the same as homosexuality (although it would follow that such a person would be attracted to partners of like physical gender). Cross-dressing is not the prerogative of "femme" males or "butch" lesbians but may be a fetish in heterosexuals. Only a minority of homosexuals have gender identity problems.

One of the most important conclusions is on the very first page, "the attempt to categorize all humanity into two mutually exclusive contrasting groups of homosexuals and heterosexuals, a form of 'them' and 'us', besides being clinically and politically dubious, provides misleading over-simplification".

"The development of sexual identity and behaviour is considered, and further chapters examine physical factors (heredity, twin studies, hormonal influences) and psychological theories. There is evidence that paedophilia is not akin to homosexuality and also that incidents of homosexual seduction in childhood or adolescence do not seem to predispose to later homosexuality. No single cause is apparent.

This is a comprehensive work. There are chapters on female homosexuality, social problems and social controls, and 25 pages of references. There is also much information about [illegible]ing; I doubt whether anyone will be turned on by reading it, but Dr West does not mince his words. His style is direct. "Ageing males of dwindling attractiveness may take to the passive role as a last resort in the search for a sexual partner or alternatively they may be obliged to forego anal pleasures on the account of the painful medical conditions that affect that part of the body."

He reveals little of himself despite a variety of astringent comments on the research and opinions of others. He is clearly a humanitarian as well as a scholar. His comments are dry, but not his facts. He concludes "Most people discover their sexual inclinations, they do not choose them, and they can be no more blamed for their sexual orientation than for their complexion". Being in a minority he reminds us, is not the same as being inferior.

Structuralism and Semiotics. By Terence Hawkes.
Methuen £2.10 416 79630 3.

As human knowledge grows ever more detailed and arcane specialisms abound, it is ironic that some of the key insights in many areas originate in quite different areas and that keeping abreast of significant developments requires increasingly an interdisciplinary perspective.

Structuralism provides a very good instance of this. As a way of reflecting about the world and man's relationship to it, structuralist thinking has long roots—going back, as Hawkes points out, at least as far as Vico in the eighteenth century. In its formal development in the twentieth century, structuralism draws on many disciplines, linguistics, anthropology, philoso[illegible] contributes in turn to each of these, to the social sciences in general, and to the study of literature.

Hawkes's concern is with the relevance of structuralism to literature. The book is part of Methuen's new series of literary, cultural and communication studies "New Accents". There is an extended introduction to the basic notions of structuralism. This is done by means of a selective historical account, focusing initially on Vico and Piaget and then on ideas from linguistics (Saussure, Sapir) and anthropology (Lévi-Strauss). This part of the book works well and largely achieves its aim of being intelligible to somebody with no prior knowledge of the field.

This is less true, in my opinion, of the following section where the relevance to literature is discussed. Hawkes gives a splendid run through the various schools and individuals who have consciously studied form in literature, beginning with the early Russian formalists and coming up to Barthes in our own day. The student will find this invaluable but it is condensed and is not perhaps as accessible as other parts of the book.

A brief introduction to the "science of signs" follows. This is what is known in Europe as semiology, in America semiotics. (The British feel free to call it either.) The formulations of Pierce and Saussure (as interpreted by Barthes) are given and the relevance to study of literature discussed. This discussion and a final chapter outlining the various approaches to literary criticism are well done and include some good examples.

Mention should be made of the bibliography, which is comprehensive without being too detailed. Being arranged under various headings it will be valuable for students in a number of different areas.

Jung and the Story of our Time. By Laurens Van Der Post.
Penguin £1.00. 14 00 4509 0.
Man and his Symbols. Edited by Carl Jung.
Picador £1.75. 330 25321 2.

These two helpful Jung primers are all right as far as they go. Their basis, that all of life is in reality one in spirit, is correct. However, the Jungian term of "animus" (for the unconscious part of woman) and "anima" (for the equivalent part of man) need redefining.

Jung and Van Der Post are both aware that this "warrior" spirit is almost extinct in the professional classes in the West at the present time.

Van Der Post at the end of his book is right to inveigh against the "master betrayal" of "(Western) man by the guardians of his spirit, the churches, priests, doctors and teachers", in the manner of an Old Testament prophet. Yet he (and Jung) both fail to connect this betrayal with the profound absence of warmth in the lives of most of the West's professional classes. Erich Fromm went some of the way towards defining the problem in these terms in his classic work The Art of Loving. Meher Baba, who died eight years after Jung in 1969, went much further in his classic work Listen Humanity.

Jung and the Story of our Time, which reads like a spiritual whodunit, is better value in its original Hogarth Press hardback edition at £5.50. It is one of those books you will read more than twice. The superbly illustrated Aldus paperback edition of Man and His Symbols is much better value at £2.95.

Magic a-brewing

The Amazing Weathercock. By Paul Newton.
World's Work £2.50. 437 62710 1.
The Rocking Horse Secret. By Rumer Godden.
Macmillan £2.95. 333 23072 8.
A Visit to Folly Castle. By Nina Beachcroft.
Heinemann £2.90. 434 92854 2.

This mixed batch of novels would suit a family with ages ranging from eight to about 88. (The 88 year olds are included more as readers aloud than as mere readers—though they will almost certainly enjoy the stories, too.)

The Amazing Weathercock is a really funny book and anyone over about seven should enjoy it a lot. In fact, older people will probably enjoy it more because, although the humour is very basic, it is the sort which gets funnier the more you hear it—family supper-table humour which consists of squeezing the last drop out of any funny notion.

Paul Newton's notion was to invent a town originally called Moan, with officials like Lawn Moan the lawn mower, which later, in the euphoria following the collapse of its monarchy, adopts the more cheerful name of Grumble, with inhabitants like Apple Grumble, the pudding-maker. Hovering around is a band of witches led by E'en to whom, of course, all the witches say at their annual assembly "Hello E'en". But the chief characters are the weathercock—who teases the grumbling citizens by willing them, from the top of his steeple, to do all sorts of (to him) amusing and (to them) uncomfortable things—and Johnny, who saves them. They are lively characters and their doings are lively, too, and the story has a cheering assumption that cheerfulness is a good thing, and an appropriately happy ending.

Rumer Godden could not write a dull story if she tried. She knows about children's deepest wishes: surprises and good food and secrets and friendship and recovered treasures—and she blends these nourishing ingredients in a different delightful way each time.

This little story should please people from the age of eight upwards. It is gently and delightfully illustrated by Juliet Stanwell Smith and tells about Tibby and her mother who come to look after old Miss Pomeroy and her beautiful dilapidated house. They are helped by Jed whom Miss Pomeroy had saved from Borstal five years before when he had broken in to look at her horses which he loved. Miss Pomeroy remains for a long time a remote, forbidding figure to Tabitha, but at last they meet in understanding and amity in the beautiful abandoned nursery. Miss Pomeroy's dying gift of her rocking horse saves all of them, and Pomeroy Place, from a sad fate, and we leave Miss Pomeroy's nieces forgiven for their thieving behaviour and all the friends just ready to enjoy their great and well-deserved happiness.

The ingredients of Nina Beachcroft's story are also tried and true. She is brewing magic and has put in the marvellous house the beautiful, haunting child, the elder sages with their mysterious ends and threatening means, the lost world, the troubling collisions of the supernatural and the mundane. But the mixture is a rich and enlivening one because she has not forgotten the essential raising agent which none of the great writers of fantasy ever forgets: a moral norm shared by author and reader and at least one set of characters.

Emma Jones, one bored evening, finds a letter in a bottle which directs her into the gardens of Folly Castle where she meets Sandra with whom she forms a great friendship. Despite the affection between the two girls, Sandra's mysterious past, her family and their hopes for the future threaten Emma's brother and at last the strange adventure ends as Sandra moves, literally, out of Emma's world. This is quite a long book, and although the characterization is vivid and the story absorbing, it demands concentration. It would suit readers of 12 and over.

Beware of fashion

Betty Kemp* on eighteenth-century history

Stability* and Strife. England 1714-1760 (The New History of England, Vol. 6). By W. A. Speck.
Edward Arnold £9.35. 7131 5974 X. £3.50. 7131 5975 8.

A generation ago, there was a dearth of text books on eighteenth-century English history. Although this is no longer so, the time of the first two Hanoverian kings—the so-called ancien régime before it began to crumble—still excites less attention than the more spectacular era of revolutions which followed it. Stability and Strife, the sixth volume in the New History of England series, is therefore a welcome book, and will be a useful one.

The title is a happier label than the usual "Whig oligarchy", or Disraeli's "Venetian oligarchy". It has the merit of reminding us, before we begin to read, that stability did not descend like a blanket when Queen Anne died in 1714. Indeed, even retrospectively, it is hard to find stability at all before George I died in 1727. When it is found, in the 1730s, it is of course associated with Walpole's policy and position: the first "prime minister" to be and remain in the House of Commons. But Walpole did not occupy a stable or a comfortable position. Stability was a hard-won and conscientious achievement, not something he could sit back and enjoy.

Mr Speck's method has merit too. More than half the book consists of what used to be called "background": descriptive and analytical chapters on the constitution, on social and economic structure and change, on the churches, on the making of the ruling class. Those chapters are full and informative. They are placed before the chapters of narrative political history, but are more than just an introduction or a prelude or even a setting. They are adjuncts, and this is particularly true of the first chapter, on the constitution.

Constitutional history, as Mr Speck says, is unfashionable nowadays. Yet perhaps historians ought to beware of fashions which are independent of, or different from, the fashions and opinions of the people they write about. Eighteenth-century Englishmen believed that their liberty, prosperity, art and letters, were not only linked with, but directly attributable to, their constitution. I suspect that Mr Speck has some sympathy with their opinion, as I do. Even if he does not, he is wise enough to see that the beliefs of contemporaries, right or wrong as later generations may judge them, are at least half the stuff of history.

So "the constitution" comes first in the book, for the sake of contemporaries, and, as it turns out, also for our benefit, for it does greatly inform not only the political chapters but some of the analytical ones as well. There is no other place in the book where it would be more fitting, or more helpful.

Patchwork face of England

F. R. H. Du Boulay

Common Field and Enclosure in England, 1450-1850. By J. A. Yelling.
Macmillan Press £8.95. 33 15703 6. £3.95. 333 15704 7.

During the 400 years comprised in the title of this book, a very large part of England, hitherto farmed as common field, was enclosed. This means that some scattered farms were consolidated, that common rights and farming procedures were often abolished, and that many fields were actually enclosed with hedges or other kinds of physical boundary. There were many kinds of variation in these changes, and the process was carried out both piecemeal and, from the 1760s, also by general parliamentary awards. In these ways the face of England was altered, though whether wholly for the better and for the more productive is impossible, as the author says, to assess in strictly quantified terms.

Like most major historical problems, that of enclosure has attracted much historical research, but in an ebb-and-flow pattern of interest and writing. Detailed work continues, but every now and then some scholar will take a deep breath and try to sum up the findings of new specialist or regional work. Dr Yelling's important book is the first general treatment of the question for over 60 years, and historians will be deeply in his debt for explaining the complexity of the interlocking problems.

In composing his survey Dr Yelling does not, of course, make everything simple. This is a technical book and as such it demands from its writer the maximum effort towards clarity. This he has achieved fairly well. The views of many scholars have been rehearsed and considered, like those of Professors Beresford and Hilton on the role of the graziers. The process of enclosure is shown in close detail by three examples: south-eastern Leicestershire, the Yorkshire Wolds and south-eastern Worcestershire. Central to the whole enclosure story was the nature of land-holding and this, too, is considered, and the book ends with exhaustive discussion of enclosure and farming systems.

It is a cruel blow that in a treatise so dependent on maps a dozen of them have been seriously misprinted. The publishers are quick to supply corrected sheets on request, but these are printed on both sides of the paper, so if it is desired to cut them out and paste them over the misprinted ones, two sets will be needed.

Things to Do

1. A person who reads books and writes reports on them is called a reviewer. Imagine you are a reviewer and write a report on these English course books, rushed to you under plain cover by the review editor of the TES.

Real life, of course, is not like that, and people do not write things in response to textbook questions. This, to my mind, is the crippling weakness of most classroom English books. The assignments and exercises which they contain, no matter how enlivened by joviality of style and the odd funny drawing, lie very uneasily against a "language across the curriculum" policy. If the explosion of interest in language development over the last few years has taught us anything, it is that skills are best practised not by isolated exercises but by taking advantage of, and building upon, the huge amount of talking, reading and writing which school life already provides.

The On Target books show some awareness of the problem of isolated language study, in that each of the topics provides ideas for extending the work in an interdisciplinary way—the "Kites" chapter has instructions for making one. Each book contains 15 to 20 topics. Each topic is usually introduced by a piece of poetry or prose and this is followed by suggestions for discussion, by ideas for writing and other activities and by spelling or grammar exercises. The books are well produced, modestly priced and thoughtfully laid out.

What worries me about them is their commitment to a formal, prescriptive approach to language—the kind of thing that everyone except some English language teachers saw the deficiencies of 50 years ago. Particularly saddening is the continual grating contrast between the well-chosen poetry and prose and the exercises which follow. Thus, a verse of Noyes's "The Highwayman" is followed up with:

> "Spelling: All these words contain gg. Find the words from the clues. To fire a pistol you pull the gg."

I was cheered only by considering possible solutions to "Someone who asks you for money could be a gg."

In book two—presumably for the average eight to nine year old—the authors assert that English nouns can be classified by gender, and set an exercise on the subject—here called, of course, a "game". In case you are wondering, "bull" is male, "cow" is female and "pencil" is neuter. Do not ask me what "baby" and "piglet" are. A cassette recording is available to supplement the books.

English for the Middle Years is very similar in intent, though the poetry and prose extracts are longer and there is more emphasis upon them. The spectrum covered by the excerpts is wide and it is likely that children could be led by them into investigating some of the books from which they are drawn. As with On Target, though, there is a perceived need to deal with "grammar". The catalogue says "Systematic practice is also provided in the basic skills of English". Oh, the questions that are begged by that statement! An example of the way that this series does it—from Book One:

> The sentence. A sentence starts with a capital letter and ends with a full stop.
> 1. Re-arrange each set of jumbled words to make a sentence. a. on children canals Dutch the skate."

No one has yet convinced me that this is the best way—or even a good way—to enhance linguistic skills. I remain open to persuasion.

After all that, thank heaven for Frank Skitt and A. & C. Black. Themes for Language Learning is a teacher's book containing seven main themes divided into about 60 working units. Each unit has an aim, notes about planning and preparation, an outline of work and suggestions for revision. The first theme, for example, "The File on Me", contains units such as "I'm a crowd", "Quiet Me" and "Where I live". Other themes include, "A fresh look at the world of people" and "Playing with language". The themes and sub-units are imaginatively chosen by a man who knows about primary age children. There are many suggestions for talking, writing and other activities, and ideas for source material. The good primary and middle school teacher probably tackles language skills in this way already, but he will undoubtedly find new material in this book. The teacher who wants to break out of a formal, coursebook approach but does not quite know what to do will find here all the support he needs until his own ideas start to flow. There is an object lesson here for those who believe that skill and structure are synonymous with dullness and over-prescription.

You could perhaps argue that Skitt's book should be backed up with pupils' broadsheets or cassette recordings, but apart from the marketing problem, it may be that the more specific the material became, the less universal would be its appeal. As it stands, the book is open to a variety of uses. The teacher who wants his language work to go hand in hand with general studies, for example, will probably find enough matching themes, and in any case there are plenty of clues to help him develop his own material. Frank Skitt has made an admirable job of encapsulating good language teaching into a practical book—something I had thought well-nigh impossible.

Discovering

Physics 11-13. By John L. Lewis
Longman £2.25. 0582 208777.

Publishers and authors need strong nerves in these days of frothy discussion about curriculum development and core subjects. New books for the middle stages of schooling must be seen to be appropriate to the core idea to appeal to those who are sensitive to the patterns of the future. This volume, described as a core book, quickly lays claim to consideration for inclusion in fundamental courses at the early secondary stage.

Inevitably, the unsolved problem of open-ended discovery versus rigidly directed and resolved experimentation arises and a possible compromise is offered. The main target is an understanding of the principles of physics, not an accumulation of facts, so background material is left for Longman Physics Topics to provide. Nevertheless, this is something more than the physics of the laboratory. Everyday applications abound, even though they may not always achieve universal approval. Not every parent, for instance, wants to see his best screwdrivers used to open paint tins, sound though the scientific principle may be. And unsupervised juniors who introduce solutions of alum and copper sulphate into the family kitchen may find their popularity reaching a new low.

But the basic ideas and concepts of a physics course are here subdivided into chapters which are in effect coherent topics. Each chapter consists of an introductory discussion neatly subdivided and interspersed with experiments, mostly open ended, and questions for class discussion. For further stimulation most chapters have homework assignments and simple revision tests

The book starts with a survey of materials followed by thoughts about the structure of matter. Subsequent topics include a survey of measurement and units, forces, pressure, energy and the essential elements of electricity.

The format is very attractive amply supplemented by photographs and diagrams. Although the book is a self-contained teaching medium, there is plentiful opportunity for the active teacher to exercise his influence.

Two new books from Oxford for C.S.E. students

Illustrated Biology
B. S. Beckett
Illustrated Biology is designed specifically to meet the needs of the C.S.E. biology student.
Illustrated Biology covers almost all C.S.E. syllabuses, and includes every topic that can be presented visually. The book is carefully structured in self-contained units, each covering one double-page spread and dealing with one particular topic. Each unit contains a maximum of 400 words of explanatory text, complemented by the author's magnificent illustrations. The book also includes revision questions and vocabulary tests.
224 pages, illustrated 019 914044 8 £2.50

Chemistry Matters
Richard Hart
Chemistry Matters is a new textbook covering all the C.S.E. syllabuses. Material within the chapters is based on syllabus requirements, and relates to a clearly defined area. Each chapter is followed by an extra time section which develops the themes of the main chapters. These sections arouse the pupils' interest, and increase their awareness of the importance of an understanding of chemistry.
The sentence structure and vocabulary have been carefully controlled, and clear print and bold headings make the book both easy to read and easy to use for reference.

Shedding light

Philip Hytch

Light and Sight. By David A. Hardy. World's Work £3.50.
The Moon. By Herbert Kondo. Franklin Watts £1.95.
UFO. By Rhoda Blumberg. Franklin Watts £2.25.
Science in a Topic: Food. By Doug Kincaid and Peter S. Coles. Hulton £1.50.

Of these four publications, Light and Sight makes the most demands on the reader. That is not to say that the topic itself is intrinsically difficult, but rather that the manner in which it is presented makes little attempt at "tempering the wind to the shorn lamb". It provides a good example of what the authors of the Bullock Report meant [illegible] of language uses which children have perforce to cope with as they move from one subject area to another, often several times in the course of a day.

While it is not made clear what kind of audience David Hardy has in mind, the complexity of the language which he employs from the outset means that those who are not already reasonably familiar with the scientific mode of presentation and explanation will quite soon be out of their depth. In a book as short as this (59 pages) which attempts to cover a wide range of material, from the nature of light itself through to photography and television, it is hard to see how the treatment could have been less dense, though a possible solution would be to advance more slowly on a narrower front. However, given these limitations, the book is beautifully produced, abundantly and colourfully illustrated, and provides excellent reading and reference sources for students both young and old.

The Moon is written in a more easily digestible style, although many of the concepts are in themselves rather difficult to grasp. Herbert Kondo has taken full advantage of the excellent photographic evidence now available to produce a comprehensive reference book which pupils of this age range and beyond will be eager to consult. Controversial issues, such as the origin of the moon, the emergence of craters and rills are dealt with in an honest, objective manner. There is always the problem inherent in trying to describe the relative motions of planets in just two dimensions, but on the whole the accompanying diagrams are helpful, [illegible] in the case of the chapter on tides, a most successful section.

The Apollo space programme generated tremendous (now historical) interest and the book sensibly capitalizes on this, providing a richly illustrated chapter telling the story of the developments leading to the landing in July, 1969. Throughout, this makes compelling reading and will hardly ever stay on the library shelves.

UFO is unashamedly a book for the layman. Its fascinating subject matter, treated in a common-sense manner, will give it instant appeal to all those readers (not only children) who half hope that our planet has been and continues to be visited by other beings. Rhoda Blumberg surveys the history of "sightings" stretching back over 3,000 years and concludes, alas, that there are rational explanations for most of them. She gives these reasons, supported by argument and, where available, photographic evidence: we are presented with a particularly persuasive account of the ways in which the characteristics of weather balloons have lent themselves to interpretation as UFOs.

However, some mystery remains: in a final section it is admitted that there are cases which so far defy rational explanation and the reader is left to make up his own mind on these, perhaps assisted by the admirable UFO bibliography which is thoughtfully provided.

Science in a Topic: Food has the characteristic appearance of the now familiar "workbook", and is evidently to be used by individuals or groups rather than as a class book. It is literally packed with material—even to the insides of the covers—and is calculated to occupy pupils usefully in a wide range of activities.

There are many rivals in this field and it is becoming increasingly difficult to choose between them. It could be said that this example looks so much like the contemporary school text that it will tend to put pupils off, but despite its outside appearance, this book has much to recommend it. The arrangement is clear, and sensible, illustrations are clear, and the various investigations are well set out, leaving room for pupils' own experimentation and interpretation whatever appropriate. The authors have been scrupulous in giving their readers warning whenever they are dealing with situations in which there is potential danger, though this praiseworthy concern is just a little marred by two illustrations which show flames licking around the sides of saucepans in a way that neither the Gas Council nor any teacher would approve.

It is only logical that teachers (and authors) should be influenced in their choice of material for middle school and CSE studies by the recommendations of the Schools Council in its report on modern languages at the higher levels. Such material must be a natural presursor to the latter and also a worthwhile and satisfying entity for those proceeding no further than CSE. Background studies—deemed by the Schools Council to be at the centre of modern languages teaching—provide a neat answer to the problem in that these can involve either total immersion in the foreign language, a gentle douche therein or merely an understanding of one's native tongue. Given this premise, the validity of "socio-cultural studies" must rest on the intrinsic merit of a range of themes designed to capture and retain the pupil's interest.

By this criterion, the Longman Group have been highly successful in catering for all levels of ability. Keith Felnson's Voyage en Aquitaine is the latest in a series which has won much acclaim. It is totally convincing, fascinating in content and a most evocative portrayal of the attractions of the Dordogne and South-West France. The book is entirely in French and wittily and imaginatively describes the realistic adventures of a family which has purchased its own gite (with defective roof and an ensuing devis for 5,000 francs) as a base for its excursions and encounters. The idiom, in both diary and conversational form, is admirably suited to the speakers and the illustrations are an education in themselves. Full marks for this intriguing venture.

Trip to Paris is one of a parallel series by Longman and is an English version of the joint authors' earlier book, Voyage à Paris. The aim of giving satisfaction to the middle-ability groups equal to that of the more linguistically endowed is commendably achieved in this adaptation. The English is straightforward and abounds with factual information, though some of the young narrators' asides seem rather gratuitously jolly. Essential words have their French equivalents and each section contains a short conversation (in French) relevant to the topic discussed. The follow-up exercises are skilfully devised and call for a close study of the text and the excellent illustrations.

The approach to factual material is broadly the same in Longman's French Workbooks with the three additions to Level 2: People at Work, Food and Shops, and Transport. French and English descriptions are evenly balanced and both complement each other. This "blending" is a clever technique and sustains a high level of interest by an almost unconscious transition from one language to the other. The exercises are similarly interwoven and based on the text and illustrations. These workbooks appear deceptively simple, but more than average intelligence and perseverance are required if their many fine qualities are to be exploited to the full.

This is France is entirely in English and contains within its short compass a remarkable amount of information on several of the major aspects of French life. This does not, however, preclude brief mention of such lesser-known facets as the minority languages (Breton, Provençal, Catalan etc), the youngsters attitude to my generation (les croulants) and why the housewife goes to une chevaline. The authors' style is refreshingly free from irrelevancy and contrived humour with, as an additional delight, many shrewd aphorisms on France and the French. The projects stem from the different topics but demand considerable personal initiative and observation on the pupil's part. This book is so good that its extension into other aspects of France must be eagerly awaited.

Also in English, but restricted to the capital, is Christopher Beswick's The New Paris. It is precisely what the title indicates: a guide to recent constructional developments in Paris, ranging from a highly detailed description of Charles de Gaulle Airport to a survey of the town-planner's dream recently realized at la Défense. This illustrated mini-Baedeker provides much essential information for those wishing to keep abreast of late twentieth-century Paris.

Perfect French?

Hugh Whittaker

Maintenant à Vous. By P. A. Grundy, E. A. Hughes and A. M. Wildbore.
Edward Arnold £1.30.
Qu'as-tu Fait? By A. M. Wildbore.
Edward Arnold 90p.

Maintenant à vous is a source of comprehension practice material, aimed chiefly at junior secondary forms. However, the authors have set out to cover a wide range of ability, and some of the later tests will stretch final-year CSE candidates. To get the best out of the book, teachers will, inevitably, have to select and prepare judiciously, and it falls some way short of being all things to all pupils.

There are six tests for reading comprehension and 13 for listening, with the full text of the listening comprehension exercises printed in the book's final section. Each unit of tests contains 20 sets of multiple-choice questions, of which about a quarter relate to the written (or heard) text and the remainder are self-contained. Subject-matter ranges from birthdays through shopping trips to holiday misadventures.

Qu'as-tu fait?—the question is answered by 20 children at la rentreé des classes. Each set of experiences is accompanied by a vocabulary list, questions in French and English, a set of unrelated multiple-choice questions, some light relief in the form of crosswords and anagrams, and a sprinkling of European Studies-flavoured topic exhortations.

Qu'as-tu fait? a single-minded little devotion to the practice of the Perfect, might work with syntax-loving 12-year-olds, but CSE classes will snort at the juvenile sexism (les filles/garçons sont stupides) and the restrained behaviour of the subjects. The author's determination to give us the Perfect prompts some unlikely—not to say unidiomatic—language: "nous n'avons pas aimé ces hommes" says Frédéric of the clumsy removal men.

The contrast between the various past tenses is largely avoided, but there are about eight incidences of the imperfect and one (maverick?) pluperfect. Etienne sees Luther's statue in Geneva—this week's Deliberate Mistake?

Modular Mathematics: Certificate Arithmetic
Heinemann Education. Twelve booklets. £2.00 or 30p each.
Exercises and test papers 95p.

The Modular Mathematics Certificate Arithmetic forms part of a certificate course which also includes volumes of geometry and trigonometry, algebra and statistics and computing. Though all are planned to follow an earlier series of Modules 1-36, this course is also projected as a suitable sequel to other introductory secondary courses by offering a two to three year preparation for the CSE and comparable examinations.

The textbook includes 12 modules, all separately available in 20 page booklets. The standardized pattern of all provides a general core course via the "basic level" sections, followed by optional "continuation level" work of a more demanding nature. General tests at both levels are added.

Teachers considering modular texts look for all-round appropriateness in the demands made on pupils, with adequate explanation and illustration, for consistency of terminology and method and smooth, continuing development—and the compilers of the course have planned thoughtfully to provide reassurance. The pattern is set in Unit 1—Number Skills—leading from short reminders of the Four Rules applied to whole numbers to prescribing patterns of layout for multiplication and division of decimals, on to equivalent fractions, wisely treated before addition, subtraction and multiplication of fractions, to complete the Basic Level. The Continuation Level adds division of fractions, their conversion to decimals and percentages, and to the ideas of and simple work on square and cube roots.

Following modules often treat topics of contemporary significance such as "Holidays and Foreign Exchange", involving realistic ready reckoners and handling currency conversions. "Scientific Notation" includes the use of indices, while "Spending Money" introduces pie charts, commission and discount. In Unit 5 "Probability" gets lively treatment, while Unit 6 contributes the concept of a flow chart and adds formulae of interest to more standard ones. Other units deal interestingly with mean, median and mode, life assurance, house purchase, rates and taxes and pictorial representation.

Throughout, the material is well-knit, with traditional working methods predominant, and significant conclusions simply highlighted. The teacher throughout controls the level of working. Fair numbers of examples are set, while many more, specifically linked with this course, are available in Exercises & Test Papers for Certificate Arithmetic.

Multiple Choice Questions in Mathematics. By R. L. Bolt and C. Reynolds.
Edward Arnold 95p.

Though research in the early CSE period contributed much towards validating the use of multiple choice questions in mathematics examinations, some teachers remain unconvinced. This selection, however, is structured as a positive teaching aid, first to detect the individual areas of revision most necessary, then, after remedial work, to assess progress. Further help comes from diagnosing basic errors in technique, revealed by incorrect answer choices.

It is stressed that pupils should be discouraged from guessing, but should work questions in normal style before checking against the choices offered. The 20 questions with each topic, graded from simpler to harder, are appropriately selected, and have already been well tested in secondary schools with a wide scatter of ability. Suitably used, the range of 28 Mathematics Topics, covering the common core of GCE O level and CSE syllabuses, could contribute to more effective learning in many classrooms.

The Five 'Anatomies'
MARJORIE BOULTON
These well-known, lively, unpretentious books are widely used as textbooks in schools and colleges, providing as they do a lucid and straightforward introduction to the main literary forms. The value of the books is summed up in a review of The Anatomy of Language in School Librarian: 'Anyone who has used Miss Boulton's The Anatomy of Poetry and The Anatomy of Prose will know that she combines the maximum of fact and example with the minimum of theory and precept; she now turns with equal success and similar methods to semantics. Teachers of English, and one hopes other teachers too, are constantly trying to persuade children to say and write exactly what they mean; in this formidable task, Miss Boulton is a powerful ally.'

Batsford.

This selection of history books for the secondary school library represents several approaches to the study of history which may be utilized in project work. Wayland has called its series Wayland History Makers. It predictably concerns itself with famous names, mainly from the recent past, and their impact upon events. They will be useful because they try to grapple with some of the problems involved in treating the very recent past or present objectively. Clearly they will be of use in the teaching of world history and social studies as well as history. The books are quite attractively presented and contain illuminating texts. The literary flights of fancy may not appeal to many (Kaiser Bill is full of them) but the books are readable and should interest abler CSE pupils in twentieth-century issues.

Batsford has additions to two of its established series. People in Period is represented by J. J. Bagley's Medieval People (with its shades of Eileen Power's noted work) and John Fines's Tudor People. This series adopts and adapts a very interesting alternative approach to that of the usual textbook claiming to show what life was like for people in past ages. Each author takes one person to illustrate the lifestyle of a particular group. For instance, John Bagley uses Thomas Holland, Earl of Kent (knights); Richard Whittington and Richard Sely (merchants); Piers the Ploughman (peasants); Abbot Ailred of Rievaulx (monks); Elizabeth Paston (housewives); Brother Thomas of Eccleston (friars); Roger Bacon (scientist); Margaret Beaufort (lady); Henry Yeveley (craftsmen); and William Thorpe (Lollard preacher).

The pupil who reads these books cannot fail to gain some understanding of the medieval world picture. There does not seem to be much mention of the fact that the lives of those chosen may not be very typical of the groups—indeed, because so much material has survived about these particular individuals it is almost certain that they were in some way untypical. Nevertheless, the biographies are clearly and intelligently written and strike just the right chord to appeal to pupils with much contemporary, but little or no historical, awareness. They are intended for project work with the 12 to 16-year-old age group but are surely a must for the abler children of the upper primary school.

Batsford's Past into Present series deals with topics which may be useful in project work with the same age group. The quality of the books in this series is rather variable. There is more temptation here than in the biographical series to present pupils with brief and over-simplified descriptions and explanations which make the historian (perhaps accustomed to over-qualify his statements) shudder with horror. But it is a valuable series and the two books here are welcome additions to it.

Particularly useful and commendable is Alan Dures's The Family which introduces pupils to a subject which is much interesting historians today and which has immediate relevance to everyone in our society. The subject is treated in scholarly fashion and will be helpful to teachers as well as their pupils. I do wish Mr Dures had treated the issue of a puritan family-style separately within the chapter on the pre-industrial family, as many historians have argued that the puritan family may provide the key to changing marital and family relationships. Mr Dures hints at this in his section on Ralph Josselin's family life but he should, I think, have taken the bull by the horns and grappled with it then and there. The book will be valuable in social studies as well as history courses.

Crime and Punishment treats a topic which is always in the news and which will arouse the interests of pupils. The statements are sometimes a little too sweeping, but the book is nevertheless valuable.

Familiar themes

Anthony Adams

Contemporary English 1 and 2. By John Foster.
Macmillan Education £1.95 each.
0 333 19670 8 and 196716.

These are two attractively produced books that in present-day terms are remarkable value for money. They are intended as source books for pupils preparing for CSE and set out to provide the core of "the students' English course and to develop their ability to use language (both orally and in writing) by setting up situations in which they are motivated to express themselves".

The range of suggestions for work involves most of the activities that might take place in the English classroom and the list of available film material and related reading that each section provides makes a useful resource for the teacher.

"Contemporary" they certainly are in format. It is rarely that I see such well produced books for classroom use. They make effective use of photographs and the typography is lively and interesting without distracting attention from the text. It is the latter that worries me, especially in view of the series title. So far from being contemporary, the books seem to go over yet again the well-worn ground of the thematic approach to English teaching with the socially relevant themes to the forefront that we have all been living with since the days of Reflections in 1964.

The roll call for book 1 will summarize what I mean: Being young . . . growing old; Love . . . and marriage; Outsiders; Sportscene—it does not require much prescience to guess the contents list for book 2. Indeed, apart from the format and design quality, the two books have a disappointingly old-fashioned feel about them. The extract material wrenched (as always in a thematically based collection) out of context to illustrate the point of the section in which it appears is generally more original in choice and source than in many similar collections and there is a sound balance of prose and verse together with extracts from newspapers, comics and magazines. The quality of what is presented is something that does not appear to have been considered by the compiler.

As a head of department in the early 60s when CSE was just beginning I would have leaped at these books as exactly the material that I was looking for. But even by 1970 when I ceased to be a full-time school teacher my stock cupboards were full of similar material. Today, with the range of reprographic equipment and skills that are available, I could supplement my 60s stock with far more genuinely contemporary material, straight from yesterday's newspaper in fact.

Like so many source books of their kind these volumes deliberately leave a good deal to the teacher. On those matters of formal skills in language with which we are all so obsessed at present we are given no more help than the bland statement "the onus is on the teacher to make the time . . . to draw individual's attention to their errors and give appropriate teaching." The teacher who could use these books successfully will probably not need to do so. Even at the remarkably cheap price with which they are presented to us we might feel that our meagre capitation allowances will be better spent on real books which (curiously enough) might have even more motivating quality with our pupils than yet another thematic addition to our stockroom shelves.

Ourselves

Illustrated Human Biology. By C. M. Wheeler.
Edward Arnold. £2.50. 7131 0419

Each page (and there are just over 300) in this book is divided into two columns, and there is scarcely one without a diagram. Most columns consist of a large clear diagram, suitably annotated, as well as about an inch or so of written material at the bottom (further information, cross references or instructions for work to be done). In 13 chapters the subject is well covered. The only reference to the aims of the book is a single sentence on the back cover, ". . . designed for those following courses leading to CSE . . . but also suitable as a rapid introduction for students intending to cover the subject in more depth".

So far—very good, and I am looking forward to the second edition, in which, I hope, the errors and ambiguities will be eradicated. Among the more obvious mistakes we find oxygen quoted as 30 per cent of the air; a platypus is labelled as a marsupial whilst the koala is called a monotreme. A cell from each sex is said to fuse to form an egg, though later the terms fertilized egg and zygote appear. Egg is a synonym for ovum. Arteries are said to contain cardiac muscle instead of smooth muscle. The scapula is said to be attached to [illegible] prevented these and many other slips from reaching the print stage.

World-wide

Visual Geographies: Unit 8: Our World. By E. M. Poxon and J. D. Poxon.
Wheaton £1.05. 08 020903 3.

Our World brings to a conclusion an excellent regional series which is particularly suitable for CSE. The book deals with the earth our home, the man-made world, the Third World, seas and oceans and the race between food and population. The themes may be rather hackneyed but the clear text and richness of visual illustration make the book useful not only in class work but also as a basis for individual projects.

ALLMAN REVISION NOTES
'O' Level and CSE

This Revision Note Series, which covers major subjects at CSE, 'O' and 'A' level, is intended to highlight some of the most important points of a long syllabus and to be used before the examinations in conjunction with notebooks or a textbook.

'O' LEVEL AND CSE CHEMISTRY
D. G. Davies & T. V. G. Kelly
Two very well-known teachers, both heads of department, bring all their experience to bear in producing a text which many 'O' level and CSE examinees will find invaluable. They cover, in only 80 pages, the essentials of the modern syllabuses, and, although concise, it is easily followed. The newer topics, such as the mole, rates of reaction, thermochemistry, equilibria and organic chemistry, are included as well as the more familiar reaction chemistry.

'O' LEVEL AND CSE COOKERY
Angela Creese
Angela Creese, author of the "Young Homemaker" books, is well-known for her ability to present facts clearly, concisely and in a readily memorable form. Here, in addition to the essentials of cookery, she gives a summary of nutrition and also includes meal planning, hygiene, kitchen equipment and safety.

History as news

Jessica Saraga

Headline history.
Tudor and Stuart Times. In the Eighteenth Century. The Nineteenth Century. The Twentieth Century. By John Ray.
Evans £1.40 each.

This series attempts to "present events as immediate, exciting news", seen through the eyes of contemporaries. Certainly the style is racy and there are some apt and enlightening quotations from primary witnesses. Whether the author has really also used "the techniques of modern journalism", as the back cover claims, is less obvious, and on examination it seems that his technique—a combination of analysis and narrative based where possible on first-hand evidence—is classically historical: the journalism is in the lay-out.

Each event is treated singly, as a news item, and given an eye-catching headline, though the format is only really convincing when in the later two volumes photographs supersede drawings, and the Gothic and other archaic fonts—fun but phony—are abandoned. Events chosen are apparently only those which hit the headlines at the time, or, in the earlier periods, would have done so given mass circulation: politics, religion, war and disaster would, perhaps predictably, sum up most of the content.

Foreign news outside British spheres of influence is not much mentioned, the only internal foreign event to make the headlines being the storming of the Bastille. Sport, on the other hand, gets pretty full treatment, and there is wide coverage of the sensational in all its forms; balloon flights, aeroplane flights, tea clipper races, and recurrent naval disasters from the 1707 wreck of four warships on the Scillies to the loss of the Titanic in 1912.

These scenes of triumph and tragedy are all graphically portrayed; perhaps the more so because they are the stuff of which the best headlines are always made. The issues are simple, background information is unnecessary, and drama content is high. Battles similarly are a strong point, but political events prove more tricky as the on-the-spot and up-to-the-minute style cannot always cope with the amount of explanation needed here. A partial desertion from the rigours of the headline method was the only possible solution, so where events become complex enough background is given to explain, enough hindsight to illuminate, but a masterly self-control still enables the author to keep each item short.

This brevity is the essence of the success of headline history; every item tells a story, complete and self-contained, so that the books can be equally useful for reference, for browsing or as course books. An original slant is sometimes derived from the association of disparate events by chronology—everything is described in the order it happened, and there are some unexpected juxtapositions. In the news for 1779-81, for example Captain Cook is murdered in Hawaii, the anti-Catholic Gordon rioters attempt to storm the House of Commons, Washington corners Cornwallis at Yorktown while, meantime on the economic front, Watt has invented rotary motion and the industrial take-off is all but underway: a rapid succession of unconnected stills but they amount to a compelling picture of the age.

Kaleidoscopic variations

Rachel Blake

A James Joyce Selection. Edited by Richard Adams.
£1.00.

Goalkeepers are Crazy. By Brian Glanville. Editor: John L. Foster.
95p.

A John Wain Selection. Edited by Geoffrey Halson.
The Experience of Prison. Edited by David Ball.
£1.00.
Longman Imprint Books.

This series, through its stimulating reading material, encourages closer understanding, a grasp of literary technique and further exploration of the themes in creative writing and other literature. The James Joyce selection of short stories, excerpts from Portrait of the Artist, and lyrics, falls down on the quality of the questions. These are all of the "How would you feel?" variety, and lead straight into creative writing, cutting out the intermediate values.

The pieces, grouped under such general headings as growth of awareness, love and conflict, and parents, are well backed up by biographical notes and a map and photographs of Joyce's Dublin. That no attention is paid to the delicate artistry of Joyce's evocations, the rhythm and ritual of his conversation and the natural flow of the stories is a deficiency which some teachers will remedy—but it is not so easily supplied by a student reading alone.

The other two collections have the advantage of direct glimpses into the writers' concepts of the short story and its gestation, in the authors' own introductions. Brian Glanville's comprehensive analysis of the sports world makes clear the necessity for a short story to transcend the limited sphere of sport. His main technical preoccupation is with the first person demotic. The often humanly moving stories, mostly about football, are followed by editor's questions which examine carefully; a main idea is to bring students who will only read about sport to full-length novels which otherwise they would have baulked at.

The editor of the John Wain selection sets even more wheels moving with more searching questions into character, motivation and effectiveness of technical methods. He moves on to sociological considerations such as the claustrophobia and tension of densely-populated urban areas, and a comparison of the pop cultures of the twenties and fifties with today's. Closer literary comparisons are invited with other treatments of themes, such as that of brain versus brawn in Manhood with David Storey's This Sporting Life, or low intellect plus brawn in King Caliban with Steinbeck's Of Mice and Men.

The Experience of Prison is the most inexhaustible of the batch, turning the subject around to show almost every conceivable aspect. Its first-hand quality, literary peaks and kaleidoscopic variations in subject (the themes are grouped in an index at the end for the convenience of teachers) are its main strengths.

The intelligence and total self-awareness of Ron, a psycopath at Grendon: ". . . I'm lacking in something, I'm lacking in a feeling for other people just as a one-armed man is lacking in a limb"; an excerpt from John McVica's account of his growth towards emotional maturity; the spontaneity and exuberance of a women's liberation song from Niantic State Prison; the preservation of human dignity in an old, hairless, toothless, expressionless prisoner in Solzhenitsyn's One Day in the Life of Ivan Denisovich; these are just indicators, and each could furnish a novel or a seminar.

But why are there no references for the excellent photographs? And how many people know where or what exactly Jilali Fort is, or even Long Lartin?

Journey Into Maths

THE SOUTH NOTTINGHAMSHIRE PROJECT

Alan Bell, David Rooke and Alan Wigley

Journey into Maths is a course in mathematics for pupils aged 11 to 13 years. It has been written as a consequence of development work undertaken by the authors in association with Alan Bell. The work has now been in progress for five years, and the materials have been used in trial form with considerable success by schools in Nottinghamshire, and other parts of the country.

The materials for the first year of the course consist of five packs of spirit masters, a booklet to develop and practise number skills and a teacher's guide. Each pack of spirit masters contains 16, 24 or 32 sheets and will provide about 250 copies of each. Both the duplicated sheets (with the exception of pack 5) and the booklet of number skills are reusable.

The first three packs of spirit masters each contain about a term's work, divided into units as follows:—

Pack 2	(0 216 90491 9)	£8.00
Pack 3	(0 216 90492 7)	£4.00
Pack 4	(0 216 90493 5)	£6.00
Pack 5	(0 216 90494 3)	£6.00
Number Skills 1	(0 216 90300 1)	80p

Colour Units

Geography

This series provides a basic course of study for CSE candidates but will also appeal to a wider age and ability range. Separate Units deal with major geographical regions of the British Isles, and with the main aspects of economic and physical geography and environmental topics specified for study in the various secondary syllabuses. With a wealth of first hand source material they are ideal for classwork or individual enquiry. Virtually all titles have been metricated.
85p each non-net

World Topics

This series covers the basic studies of world geography required by the secondary examination syllabuses, but most of the Units are also suitable for non-examination students. It deals with international industry and agriculture, trade, communications, land use and population. The series cuts across traditional subject barriers and examines key economic and sociological problems.
85p each non-net

Biology

These twelve colourful paperbacks together form a foundation course for CSE. Exercise and project work based on the text form an integral part of the teaching method, and the simple, brief explanations and bright, clearly labelled illustrations will ensure that students' interest is maintained.
95p each non-net

Mathematics

The investigative approach to mathematics is emphasised in this series of fully metricated Units. The individual Units are inter-related to give a well balanced blend of traditional and modern mathematics. Ideas are approached through and related to the student's own experiences and skilful use of colour holds his interest and helps to elucidate the more difficult concepts.
75p each non-net

THE TIMES EDUCATIONAL SUPPLEMENT

FRANCES FARRER

reports on the 16th Didacta in Brussels

Reaction against audio-visual media and a return to books characterized this year's international exhibition of education equipment, the 16th Didacta. There were fewer computers on show than had been expected and most innovations were in audio-visual software rather than equipment.

Ms Christine Ryffel, director of the Eurodidac Praesidium, sees this as the natural result of financial recession coupled with a widespread disenchantment with new teaching methods, finding expression in a return to traditional materials. However, she also sees it as temporary and thinks that the 1981 exhibition will have a different emphasis again.

Similar educational problems seem to be causing concern in different degrees throughout Europe. Everyone is worried about unemployed school-leavers and several countries have programmes which attempt to woo them back into some form of education. The Dutch estimate their "demotivated group of reluctant learners" at 5 per cent of the 16 to 18 age-range and have several schemes involving audio-visual rather than printed material.

"Continuing education" was a popular phrase at Didacta and the theme of one of the day-long discussion sessions. It was related mainly to basic skills, technical training, and literacy schemes for immigrant workers. "I think we've more or less solved our literacy problem", said Ms Ryffel optimistically of Germany, but others were less confident. Few countries apart from Britain have begun to tackle numeracy.

Another trend that Britain shares with several European countries is a renewed interest in primary school science teaching which results in attempts to find new methods and materials. Unilab have some simple apparatus for testing the properties of water, which offers six basic experiments.

French scientific equipment is increasing rapidly, encouraged by local rather than national funding. Foreign language teaching is considered of prime importance by many within the European Community including Dr Guido Brunner, EEC education comissioner.

Welsh and Scottish nationalists who are reviving Celtic cultures would find world-wide sympathy. Australian publishing houses are throwing off years of British domination and initiating most of their own school texts, among them the Rigby Language Builders scheme produced by Lloyd O'Neill.

Interest in ecology and lack of faith in a technological future was reflected both by quantities of published material and the surprising low profile of computers. AV-Media of Denmark showed an excellent cartoon film called Growing Pains, nominally about gross national product, actually revealing deep disillusionment with modern industrial life.

Hadu-Hagemann and Technofor of Germany illustrated the two extremes of the microprocessor spectrum, the first with an advanced 12-bit demonstration model, the second with the Contix task setting device which can be used by children over the age of six and is said to strengthen concentration.

Manufacturers from Sweden and Holland murmured vaguely about schemes for the immediate introduction of microprocessors into the classroom but no one seemed to have any hard facts. "Or any software", said a man from the BEEA.

Censorship is relatively unmentionable in England, related to schoolbooks or anything else, presumably because the British prefer to think it does not exist. In other countries it is talked of quite openly. On the Swedish Unicart stand it was explained that an all-party (except Communist) committee reviews textbooks in controversial subjects such as history and sociology, and can prevent their use in schools.

Unicart recently had to defend an atlas in which the word "Hottentot" had been used. This entailed searching out a speech given by a black leader in which the word was used several times. An Australian publisher said that a book about Eskimos which described communal living and polygamy was banned last year in Queensland as being likely to deprave and corrupt. Perhaps we are better off in some ways, after all.

Companies from small countries with limited home markets naturally look to trade fairs such as Didacta to arrange for export and to look for representatives. In this category this year was Essolte of Sweden, who make an incredibly wide range of school furniture and equipment as well as publishing books and materials. Among their new items is an eye model with various glass discs which illustrate faulty vision.

One of the newest, and simplest, audio-visual gadgets on show was a flexible metal belt which holds half-frame and full frame slides and filmstrips. It can be used with the Hanimex Rondette 110 projector and can change slides at the rate of about three a second, providing effective semi-animation.

Despite the lack of innovation there was a general feeling of optimism at Didacta and no great foreboding about the future. The educational market like many others is trying to play safe at the moment. It may well be the better for it.

Fewer Didactas – more innovations

Didacta officials and most of the exhibitors seem well pleased with the 1978 exhibition. There were fewer visitors—about 40,000 as opposed to 60,000 at Basle in 1976—but Mme Christine Ryffel, director of the Praesidium, expressed the general view when she said that the right contacts were being made. Both British and foreign exhibitors still feel that going to Didacta is a unique and worthwhile exercise.

Changes in emphasis reflected economic shifts of recent years and there was a general feeling of retrenchment and taking stock. About the same number of exhibitors had almost all taken smaller stands. Some large manufacturers who sell mainly to the domestic consumer

Testing, testing . . .

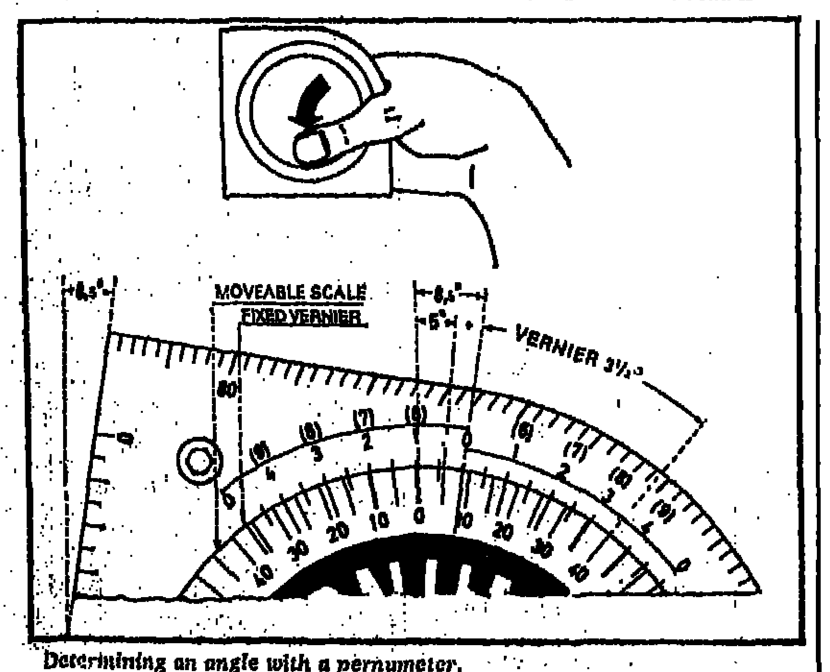
A visit to the recent Materials Testing Exhibition in Birmingham convinced me that machines are taking over to such an extent that the operator now only has to put in the sample of material and tear off the printed-out test report at the other end (not forgetting to add his initials).

A great array of up-to-the-minute testing and measuring equipment was on show, using such techniques as ultrasonics, eddy current, magnetic field anomalies and X-rays. More conventional equipment was, however, still in evidence, some actually coming into price ranges which schools and colleges could afford.

Relatively cheap and easy to use are the magnetic particle inspection inks for detection of cracks in magnetizable materials. All that is required is a permanent magnet and an aerosol can of the ink. Testing of a sample can even be done "in situ". The magnetic particles [illegible] any areas where there is a disturbance in the uniform magnetic field at the surface of the sample, making cracks down to a claimed three microns wide visible to the naked eye.

Supramor and Lumor inks are available at around 75p a can from Burmah Castrol, Pipers Way, Swindon, Wiltshire SN3 1RE, and dry powder sprays (£5.75 a can) from R. E. Cohen, 22 Crosfield Road, London, NW3.

My nomination for best buy for educational or even home use was one of the cheapest items on display. The pocket-sized Pernumeter is a fast, simple and accurate instrument for measuring angles, using the "plumb-bob and protractor" principle in an updated form. The zero calibration of the circular scale is counterbalanced always to point upwards, so that when the case of the instrument is placed against an inclined surface the angle of slope can be read off down to an accuracy of 0.25° on a [illegible] scale.



Determining an angle with a pernumeter.

Estimation of heights and coarse levelling is also possible using this instrument (maths departments take note). (£6.50 basic or £13.50 de luxe model from Elcometer Instruments, Edge Lane, Droylsden, Manchester M35 6BU).

Wardray, of Oxford, produce machines for high definition radiography. The units will never be seen in educational establishments because of their high cost and the radiation dangers. I am sure, however, that the results of this technique will be seen in schools in the future. Instead of the normal fuzzy X-ray negatives of the sort produced by hospital equipment, sharp photographic-quality negatives can be produced. The advanced focusing system not only increases definition but allows separation of subjects and film giving enlargement.

X-ray photographs taken at ±5° can also be viewed in a simple stereoscope to give a stunning 3-D effect. Harwell Non-destructive Testing Centre, at Didcot, Oxfordshire, will produce these radiographs to order for industry; why not for schools—if some enterprising person could find a way of spreading the high initial cost by selling sets of duplicates?

Study strategies

A new tape and book study package entitled Effective Learning: A Practical Guide for Students has been published by Tetradon. The cassette contains a series of talks by four authors: L. J. Haynes of the Open University, P. D. Groves of the University of Aston, R. B. Moyes of the University of Hull and P. J. Hills of the University of Surrey. The talks cover the importance of an effective strategy for study—getting equipped, making the most of lectures, using the library, tutorials, practical classes and resources, memory and learning and examinations. They are aimed at students about to start a college, polytechnic or university course.

The price is £4.97 (including VAT) and the package is available from booksellers or, by post, from University Bookshop, University of Surrey, Guildford, Surrey; 25p should be added for postage and packing.

Ladybird Books have joined forces with Scripture Union to publish cassettes of bible stories told by Derek Nimmo. Each pack will cost £2.75 and will contain a book, a cassette and a colouring book.

have closed their educational programmes: Grundig and Siemens were not there.

However, in many senses Didacta is expanding. This year about 26 countries were represented, including Jordan, Finland, Yugoslavia and Morocco. Japan, Canada and the United States are also keen to expand into the European educational market and were at the exhibition in force. Paradoxically there were fewer German companies than at the 1976 exhibition. John Savage, director of the British Educational Equipment Association, suggests that Germans prefer not to travel too far from their own borders, especially since alternate Didactas are held on their home territory, where the whole thing began.

The next Didacta will be in Basle in 1981 as the start of the new policy of having the main exhibition every three years instead of every two. In the past few years there has been a large international Didacta every other year, alternating with a smaller exhibition held in Germany. From now on it is fairly certain that international Didacta and German Didacta will alternate every three years, leaving one year with no exibition at all. This is partly because of cost and partly so that exhibitors will have more new items to show.

Birmingham is proposed for the 1984 exhibition, but in this case the German reluctance to travel anywhere at all is augmented by many Europeans' dislike of the English Channel. John Savage is concerned that if Didacta did go to Birmingham, small British companies would not be able to exhibit unless the British Overseas Trade Board regarded it as an international fair and applied the same subsidies as they do in Europe.

Simple Maths Packs 1 and 2
By W. G. Barrett, R. G. Hollis, C. K. Gillellon and M. Smith
Cassell & Co, 35 Red Lion Square, London WC1. £3.50 each.

These packs of 28 cards each are designed to cover basic mathematics ideas. They would probably be most useful in the middle of the junior school although remedial secondary children could find them helpful. The cards involve the minimum of reading, with diagrams, pictures or examples to assist or supplement the text.

However, although they are not graded (set two is only slightly more difficult than set one), the questions on each card are progressively more difficult, and less able children might still become discouraged.

The sets include work on measurement (cm and km), coordinates, simple shopping, weight (tonnes and kg), graph reading, symmetry, codes, perimeters and areas, simple solids, maps, temperature as well as a crossword and pleasantly unusual stimulus for straight four rules of number work. However, the cards' very comprehensiveness necessitates further work on each of the ideas: they are not the basis for a mathematical programme.

The cards are attractive with clear print and good colour. They are laminated on one side and the packs include answer cards.

The cards sometimes fall into the trap of providing interesting situations but trivial mathematical content. Teachers using them would need to be aware of the gaps in coverage and the need to provide more systematic practice in some of the topics. Nevertheless, they could prove useful as an introduction or precursor of such practice, or to reawaken lost mathematical interest among some pupils.

Reading styles

The University of Reading's Reading Centre has come a long way in ten years

CAROLYN O'GRADY reports

In 1968 Betty Root was working for the University of Reading, training teachers who were coming back to work after a long absence. She was constantly carrying reading materials round in her small car, an exercise which she came to look upon as both back-breaking and unnecessary. So that year she asked the university for a room to mount a permanent exhibition of reading materials.

Ten years later that small exhibition of mainly hand-made materials has taken over the building previously occupied by the Institute of Education and has become the nearest thing Britain has to a national centre for the teaching of reading. Recently this fact was acknowledged when the Bullock committee, during their deliberations, made three visits to the centre.

There are 234 reading centres in the United Kingdom, but most serve only one local authority or a college of education. Reading University Reading Centre now receives visitors from all parts of Britain and abroad. They come to look at the materials on display, to talk to Betty Root or her two part-time assistants—someone is always on hand to offer advice—or to attend courses at the centre.

These are mainly month-long courses for lecturers or advisory teachers on the teaching of reading and language, but the School of Education also runs short courses for local teachers.

Keeping the exhibition up to date has been a considerable feat. Most publishers have now heard of the centre and send new materials automatically, but it was not always like that. Mrs Root recalls how before the centre's reputation was established, staff had to pour over journals, look for news of publications and then nag publishers into sending samples.

In the past 10 years there has been an explosion of materials for the teaching of reading. Recently the centre has also had to take account of the adult literacy campaign and may soon be displaying materials in the general "basic skills" area. All materials for the teaching of reading are tried out in local schools and the reports written by the teachers are available at the centre. Betty Root and her staff will rarely hazard an opinion before the official report has arrived.

"You can't anticipate how children will react. Often materials arrive which we don't like on sight, but the children love them".

In any event the ultimate choice has to be the teacher's own. Only they know their schools and pupils.

The next step for the centre is into research. Already available is a register of research into reading which is edited by Elizabeth Goodacre of the School of Education and updated annually. Now the university is looking for a full-time researcher to investigate the cultural, psychological and perhaps physical obstacles which children face in their attempts to read. The researcher will also build up a new course which will lead either to a diploma or an MA component in teaching reading.

Mrs Root is anxious that any research should have direct benefit in the classroom. "School-based in-service training is the only way to effect change", she maintains. In accordance with this philosophy she visits local teachers in their schools after they have attended courses to discuss any problems they may be having in applying what was learnt on the course and also to help disseminate relevant ideas to the rest of the staff. As in the centre, where someone is always available to help visitors the custom is personal and direct help.

TALKBACK

Professionals or trade unionists?

Peter Baines

Maurice Kogan ("Good case, bad tactics", March 24) blurs the issues involving teachers' withdrawal from meals supervision.

He suggests the professional responsibilities of teachers are at odds with traditional trade union methods. This presupposes teaching is a profession, when it manifestly is not.

A majority of teachers would probably wish to be treated in a manner befitting those who enjoy unchallenged professional status. But this aspiration does not justify the self-award of the accolade of professionalism.

A profession is self governing, and exercises a firm control of its own entry. There is no statutory Teachers' Council which might exercise this control; the James report virtually dismissed the possibility of any teacher control of entry, on the grounds that it would inhibit government forward planning.

A profession would be expected to lay down a professional code of conduct with penalties for breaches. At present epithets of "unprofessionalism" are frequently used, but only mean "what you are doing is something that I believe a teacher should not do".

The carrot "professionalism" has been used by authority to increase teachers' work without increasing its remuneration. Many teachers have fallen willingly into the seductive status trap. Has this something to do with their social vulnerability?

In the fifties and sixties, people with minimal qualifications tried to shrug off their working-class backgrounds and erstwhile occupations. Starry-eyed, they entered "the teaching profession", and the empty nomenclature became all important. Many preferred the illusion of middle-class professionalism to the reality of detailed contracts which would specify rights and obligations.

The accession of the NUT and the NAS to the TUC must have come as a profound shock to the "new professionals". But the Executives of the two unions took this decision to prevent individual teachers from joining the TGWU and NUPE, as a number had already done. Membership of the TUC meant the industrial unions could have been accused of "poaching" had they continued to accept teachers.

The withdrawal of school meal supervision has demonstrated that teachers put in a great deal of unpaid overtime, something that other workers would reject instantly, if such a thing were required of them. Many teachers, perhaps a majority, devote hours of their time to fund-raising, arranging excursions, consultations with parents, games supervision and attendance at in-service courses.

Even the "Nine to Four" teachers must devote extra hours to preparation and marking. It is unrealistic to talk of the short school day. Even teachers who can pursue varied interests outside education must put in considerable extra work, if only to ensure they reach the required level of pedagogical efficiency.

The union should press for contracts that provide for overtime payments for organized out-of-school activity. If, after consultations, it is decided that school meals have some educative value, then teachers willing to undertake supervision should be paid at a realistic hourly rate. The humiliating "dole" of a free (and often mediocre) meal for teachers supervising, should become a thing of the past. It smacks of the unseemly arrangements of Dotheboys Hall.

Peter Baines is head of history, Maybury Junior High School, Hull.

Sir,—In 1974 I edited a collection of autobiographies of working people of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries under the title Useful Toil, which has recently been republished by Penguin Books. This was concerned with the working experiences of domestic servants, agricultural labourers, miners, cotton workers, printers, stonemasons and others: many of the contributions were original, first-hand accounts by "ordinary" people who had never expected to see themselves in print.

I am now working on a similar collection of autobiographies which will concentrate on childhood, family, education and recreations. They will cover the period from the 1820s to the 1920s, and will not be confined to specific occupations or social classes: indeed, one of the intentions will be to explore the different family experiences of richer and poorer groups.

Although many such autobiographies were published in the last century, very many more remain in manuscript form, sometimes as treasured family possessions, but sometimes as unwanted lumber in cellars and lofts. I am especially interested in those which have survived from previous generations, and the autobiographies of those still living which relate to the years before the First World War.

If any of your readers possess such material, and would like it to be considered for publication, may I ask them to communicate with me at the address below? It will, of course, be treated with the greatest care and, if used, will be suitably acknowledged in the publication.

JOHN BURNETT,
Professor of social history,
Brunel University,
Uxbridge,
Middlesex.

Roy Hill

It has always seemed a pity to me that excellent pieces of student work are seen only by the teachers marking them, or possibly the rest of the classes. In an attempt to reach a wider readership, Northamptonshire published a book of poems from schools and colleges. This book had a limited success—limited, in fact, to 600 copies—and the ratepayers paid the bill.

We now print 50,000 copies of examples of students' work once a month, and it costs nothing! The firm which does the printing even pays our expenses.

Our local newspaper, The Chronicle and Echo, uses material provided by the schools for a monthly full-page feature called Out of School, Into Print. The material is usually verse, although the features editor also welcomes stories and articles.

Each page is illustrated by drawings and photogaphs by students; we have even published the manuscript of an original piece of music written for the flute by a 14-year-old boy.

Each month a different theme is used. We have had Love on St. Valentine's Day; Dreams; Violence; the inevitable Christmas; Beginnings' when Shirley Williams opened the new buildings for Northampton's old established School for Girls (all the work for this particular page was provided by girls of the school); Fear; Old and New.

We are now working towards a page with contributions from students in Northampton, Mass., and, if we dare, a page of teachers' work.

The owners of the newspaper have been so pleased with the feature that they are sponsoring an anthology of poems from Northamptonshire schools and colleges to be published in the autumn. All the profits from the project will go to a children's charity.

The main problem is choosing from the wealth of material. A typical month will see me sifting through about 150 pieces of work, ranging from a seven-year-old's rhyme, through a middle school class's attempts at Haiku, to the mature vers libre of an Oxbridge candidate.

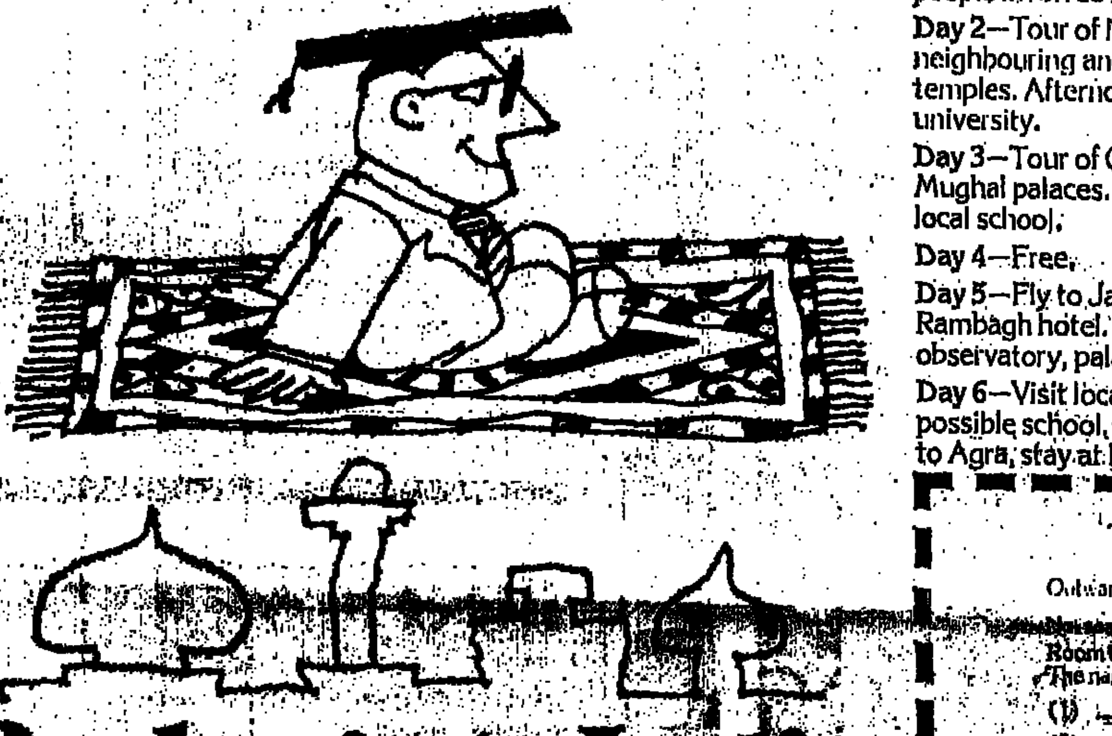
The sense of achievement at seeing one's work in print is tremendous and can provide the vital spur for producing more. I do not think that this sense of pride should be belittled. Ian Mayes, the paper's feature editor, claims his love for words sprung from seeing in print a letter he had written to a magazine while still a schoolboy.

The provision of a monthly theme with the carrot of possible publication is a stimulus for writing in the schools. The consequent polishing session can be of enormous value.

The page is a great shop-window for education in our town and county. Probably 100,000 people see the work done in schools and colleges, work which is a credit to both staff and pupils.

Roy Hill is head of communication studies, School of Humanities Nene College, Northampton.

TES TRAVEL OFFER



Package to India

The Times Educational Supplement is arranging in conjunction with Lunn Poly and Air India a two-week trip to North West India departing from London on July 23 1978. The tour will cost a modest £520 and will visit Delhi, Agra, Jaipur, Chandigarh, Patiala and Simla. Visits of educational interest will also be included.

The tour's guides are suitably expert and its hotels (and the food) are superb—the sumptuous Rambagh Palace at Jaipur for instance was built as a maharajah's residence and is still staffed by many of the old servants.

Where you go

Day 1—Stay at Oberoi Maidens hotel, Delhi. Evening reception to meet local people involved in education.
Day 2—Tour of New Delhi and neighbouring ancient monuments and temples. Afternoon visit to Delhi university.
Day 3—Tour of Old Delhi and Mughal palaces. Afternoon visit to local school.
Day 4—Free.
Day 5—Fly to Jaipur, stay at Rambagh hotel. Tour of Amber Fort, observatory, palaces, city centre.
Day 6—Visit local village and if possible school. Afternoon free. Fly to Agra, stay at Holiday Inn.
Day 7—Visit Fatehpur Sikri and Sikandra, Taj Mahal, and Agra antiquities. Travel back by Taj Express to Delhi.
Day 8—Coach trip to Chandigarh, Oberoi Mount View hotel.
Day 9—Tour of locality, visit to village and school; free afternoon.
Day 10—Excursion to Patiala, and meeting with members of local Sikh community.
Day 11—Drive to Simla, stay in Oberoi Clarks hotel.
Day 12—Free, optional walking or bus tour.
Day 13—Drive to Chandigarh, fly to Delhi.
Day 14—Fly to Heathrow.

HISTORY

Heads of Department

HACKNEY DOWNS SCHOOL (SB),
Downs Park Road, E5 8NP.
Comprehensive, 11-19. (Roll: 970).
Tel.: 985 8886/8.

Required for September, a Head of History, Scale 3. In the Junior School, the historians are closely involved in joint planning and teaching in a Humanities Department; and there is some concentration on "Third World" material as part of our developing multi-ethnic programme. In the Senior School, "O" level, "A" level and CSE courses are followed, and it is hoped that the Department will develop a Mode 3 CSE, matching the policy of several other departments, and enabling the styles of work developed in the junior school to be continued more readily. In the well-established Sixth Form, "A" level work is shared with our "twinned" girls' school, Dalston Mount.
There is a tradition of intensive and open staff discussion, and the Head of History would be expected to play a part in policy making.
Through curriculum rearrangements following two retirements, some "A" level teaching in Economics will be available, and an ability to handle this, though not essential, will be an advantage.
Applicants are welcome to visit the school by telephone appointment.

John Stephens discusses the place of music in the curriculum

Authorities are asked to report on their policies for English mathematics, modern languages, science and religious education. Specific reference is made to these subject areas because they have given rise to recent discussion and concern. It does not follow that other subject areas are considered to be less important.—DES Circular 14/77. November 1977.

Whatever assumptions are displayed in this statement from the circular dealing with l.e.a. arrangements for the school curriculum it clearly acknowledges that music has not surfaced in either discussion or concern for the preparation of future educational plans. The fact that every major report on education this century, from Hadow (1926) to Plowden (1967) has drawn attention to the need for improving provision for music in the curriculum, appears to have made little impact on the thinking of why it claims a place in the curriculum.

Fortunately music was around long before anyone thought up educational systems. Man's continuing need to express his thoughts and feelings in symbolic form is more basic than the institutions he has created.

The curriculum represents what a school, an authority or a country intends for all its pupils and students. Any subject or area of experience claiming a place, and that means time and resources, in the curriculum must address itself to these intentions. If, for example intentions are broad enough to embrace intuitive as well as logical thought, imagination and invention as well as application, and a constructive use of leisure time, then music along with other arts subjects should feature prominently in the curriculum or enquiries made about it.

Learning is about the growth of experience and relationships with people and materials. Music has played a significant part in every culture because its expression covers the range of human experience and feeling in a medium which does not necessarily rely upon the formal contexts of spoken languages.

Every advance in technology is made by the creative capacity of the human imagination. The processes involved in generating artistic activity at all levels are the same as those elements which, in the worlds of industry and commerce seek to improve man's lot in his environment. Imagination is about understanding and anticipating instinctively and emotionally as well as intellectually. A definition of "imagination" in an educational context is unlikely to embrace such speculative notions as 'idle fancies, or day-dreams."

No, imagination is concerned with effort; the effort required to assemble or re-assemble ideas, images and facts to create and recreate new images. These are the very processes essential to all aspects of musical discipline. Involvement as listener, performer or composer requires this commitment of the imagination. Imagination is a skill requiring understanding of the appropriateness of materials and behaviour. Violence, vandalism and other anti-social behaviour are for example symptoms of a lack of development in imagination.

The romantic notion of artistic inspiration does not see the musician as a "worker". The worker regards leisure as a relaxation, non-work if you like. Yet, the positive use of leisure, and the inspiration of the creative artist both require effort. An attitude of "working" at our leisure pursuits might be more constructive in a society in which patterns of employment and work hours are rapidly changing, than regarding them as a "soft option".

The positive social and economic value of leisure activities through which people gain a sense of personal achievement and satisfaction from the investment of time and effort appears to have had little recognition. We are in danger of becoming a society released by modern technology from much of the labour and effort in "work" yet unable to find an alternative purpose in life and use of our time.

There is little doubt that for a committed minority music in school is an activity which stimulates a sense of purpose. These pupils are rightly distinguished by the contribution they make to the community life of a school. Such recognition is usually marked in achievement by concerts, productions and numerous events in venues from fêtes to concert halls. The purpose of such activity is generated by the product or outcome.

The function of music in education is, however, also to do with process—a recognition that people change, that music continues beyond formal schooling, and that the many forms of musical expression provide for a greater understanding of self.

Through symbolic forms man can recognize his own uniqueness and those attributes which he has in common with his fellows. As with the other arts, music represents a "symbolic form" enabling man to "work through" his emotions—reflecting activity to which Robert Witkin (The Intelligence of Feeling) refers.

In this sense music has an important contribution to make to emotional and social education. It represents a vehicle for the expression of the range of human emotion while it is still within the discipline and control of the creator. Reflective expression is the control and discipline of emotions, while reactive expression is spontaneous and sometimes thoughtless response.

How schools choose to develop techniques to apply a curriculum policy for music will depend upon staffing, resources and other constraints. The context should be in association with the other arts, to present a major area of the curriculum claiming equal status with other important blocks of the curriculum. The arts are concerned with a different kind of "knowing" from other subjects; knowing borne of experience rather than received views and information. As such I believe that there should be a common (not identical) experience in music for all pupils up to age 16.

The claim is not for more than an equal share of time with other curriculum aspects, but rather for considering and implementing an appropriate time structure to meet particular objectives. These objectives should include the vital area of the development of knowing our feelings.

"Those whose feelings are unintelligible to them are as assuredly handicapped in the regulating of their lives as those who are unable to think coherently and who can make little sense of the world they share with other men."—Robert Witkin.

Link and Junior 2 now available

Developed by the Schools Council Project 'Music Education of Young Children'

This material, which is currently in use in over 1,000 schools, is a structured music programme specifically developed for the Primary School Class Teacher having little or no knowledge of music.
The learning has been broken down into small steps and the teacher can easily learn with the pupils. Music specialists too will find the materials of great value in helping them to deal with small groups progressing at different rates.
The children use cassettes and work material to which they respond. Classroom organisation of groups is similar to that employed in the teaching of language or mathematics.
The starting points are Infant Stage or Junior 1, followed by Link or Junior 2, respectively. For details see pages 217 to 221 of our 1978/9 Equipment Catalogue.
Similar material for use with 3-5 year olds is in course of preparation.

Dave Gelly introduces Tinderbox

Tinderbox is not the only travelling music event for schoolchildren, but it is certainly one of the best. It is presented by two amazingly versatile musicians, David Moses and Friedemann Witeka, who play, sing, tell stories, fool about, and turn even the most crowded school hall into a kind of musical party.

It is enormous fun, but when it is over the children have learnt a few basic musical principles, and—perhaps more important—have experienced live, professionally played music at close quarters.

They manage to cram an extraordinary amount into their hour-long show, particularly audience participation. Anyone with experience of this kind of thing will know that the problem is to get everybody bubbling without actually boiling over into a riot. Tinderbox bring the trick off perfectly.

They can get several hundred assorted kids to sing, clap, chant and call out answers. They bring volunteers out of the audience to form an impromptu orchestra of chimebars and percussion; rehearse them and produce a very passable performance in the space of a few minutes. For all its casual ease it is quite a tour de force.

The learning part is entirely painless. For instance, they get across the principle that "bigger means lower." by producing ever-larger recorders, from descant to bass, and playing them in a constantly-changing duet. Similarly, the range of music which can be produced from the guitar is vividly conveyed by brief examples of flamenco (very fiery and fearsomely accomplished) to gentle folk strumming.

This is the show for primary schools which Tinderbox have perfected over a period of four years. A recent and much more daunting project has been the development of a secondary school programme. Most teenage children have acquired a measure of sophistication about music—the record industry has seen to that. They are familiar with the results of advanced electronics as applied in rock music, even if they do not know how they are achieved. To devise a show for them meant incorporating a p.a. system and some modest electronic gadgetry.

Using fuzz box, digital delay and phaser they demonstrate first how the sound of acoustic instruments can be modified and then pass on to purely electric guitar, bass guitar, and so on. The whole programme is helped along by a moderately lunatic space story, featuring Captain Biggles, in which the audience are called upon to make various outlandish noises.

Because secondary pupils range from sub-teens to sixth formers (and everybody knows that people aged 15 to 18 are deeply conscious of their dignity), there is less participation for older audiences and the explanations are a little longer and more technical.

Recently Tinderbox have begun giving evening shows to parent-teacher meetings and community groups. These present a special problem because, as David Moses points out, children are settled and fairly calm in school whereas, surrounded by their mums and dads (and other people's mums and dads) they are much more self-conscious. Nevertheless, by adapting the programme to the occasion, some very rewarding sessions can be achieved.

The common strand uniting all the various Tinderbox programmes is the demonstration of different forms of music, from all over the world and from many historical periods.

Even in the electronic show this is retained, with folk songs, ethnic instruments and snatches of melody, from the Middle Ages to Erik Satie. Whether it is "Jamaica Farewell" played on two African thumb-pianos or an English folk song in the style of Bert Jansch and John Renbourn, every performance sets out to celebrate the infinite variety of music which is there to be enjoyed.

I have seen many educational music-shows but rarely come across happier or more satisfied customers. The explanation lies partly in the easy familiarity and sheer good nature which Tinderbox brings to the job. But there is more to it than that.

David Moses and Friedemann Witeka are not just fooling around, and even the youngest member of the audience seems to realize that their ability to handle that arsenal of instruments is out of the ordinary. It is the precision, the sheer expertise of it, which finally does the trick.

Society event

Have you ever heard of the Music in Schools Conference? Did you know that since 1964 it has been an annual event? It is a one-day conference organized by a committee formed of representatives of twenty societies and associations connected with music in education.

Each society takes it in turn to run and themes so far include Music with the Unwilling, Strings for the Future, Woodwind and Brass in Schools, Full Orchestra, The Pleasures of Singing, Improvisation in Education, and The Recorder—an Instrument for Life.

Distinguished speakers have figured at these conferences but they are by no means restricted to lectures. Most of them have included musical contributions from children, and often from the participants.

This year the course is in London at Philippa Fawcett and Furzedown College of Education, and takes place on May 20.

Called "A Taste of Orffery", it will offer anyone interested in Carl Orff's approach to music education a chance to see groups of children at work, to participate in some practical music making themselves, and to join in a discussion with experienced teachers in this field.

There will be a display of instruments, music, articles, books and recordings.

Special musical training and excellent opportunities are provided for talented musicians, as well as a good general education. The Purcell School is a coeducational day school for pupils aged 9-18, and it is the only specialist music school in the Greater London area.

Some bursaries are available for candidates with exceptional musical ability or potential.

Direct entry into the sixth form is possible either for A level courses or for intensive instrumental study.

Further information is available from the Secretary.

THE HAWKES SCHOOL SERIES: VARIATIONS ON A FAVOURITE THEME

The original Hawkes School Series has been the mainstay of the school orchestra library for the past fifty years. Now that the level of technical proficiency among young players has dramatically improved and a wider availability of instruments—especially wind—prevails in schools, we are introducing two new series: the HSS200 and HSS300 editions.

Still under the general editorship of David Stone, HSS200 employs the resources of a larger basic ensemble than the earlier series, while still retaining many cued parts for the small orchestra. HSS200 will therefore embrace a wider selection of orchestral pieces than was previously possible.

HSS300 will contain works by notable living composers as well as music by older masters. Whereas both the original HSS and the new HSS200 series each has its own standard instrumentation with cued parts, HSS300 consists of works that can be performed only in the instrumentation specified by the composer.

Further details of the Hawkes School Series are available from The Sales Promotion Department, Boosey & Hawkes Music Publishers Limited, The Hyde, Edgware Road, London, NW9 6JN (Tel: 01-205 3861). Schools and bona fide organisations can apply for inspection copies of scores.

The first titles to be published in the HSS200 edition are:
HSS201 J S Bach Three Chorales, arranged by David Stone (The 'Passion' Chorale, Praise the Word and Sleepers, Wake!)
HSS202 Franz Schubert Ballet Music No. 2, from 'Rosamunde', arranged by David Stone

The first titles to be published in the HSS300 edition are:
HSS301 Peter Maxwell Davies Five Klee Pictures
HSS302 Frederick Delius Sleigh Ride
Full details of instrumentation and price are available on application

Money well spent?

The Calouste Gulbenkian Foundation recently announced the winners of its 1978 Music Fellowships to two pianists and a singer. For the past four years the scheme has rewarded only cellists, pianists, and singers (15 of them) and only one girl. There must be a useful glut by now of outstandingly talented young male cellists, pianists and singers busily "foregoing unhelpful engagements for a few years in order to learn repertoire, perfect technique and establish their careers on a firm basis" (paraphrasing Gulbenkian, and their non sequitur) on £1,000 a year. You can forego a lot on £1,000 a year these days. This sort of pointless gesture is treating musicians like livestock. If Gulbenkian intends to promote the art of music and not just its talented performers, it would do better by investing in those instruments and talents capable of adding most to the sum of musical knowledge. If it were really interested in orthodox careers, the money were better offered as an inducement to an agency. At present it is merely buying up superfluous talent.

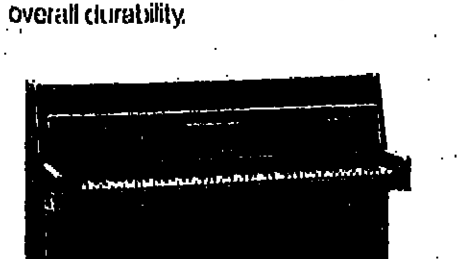
Yamaha. Craftsmen to the world's musicians since 1887.

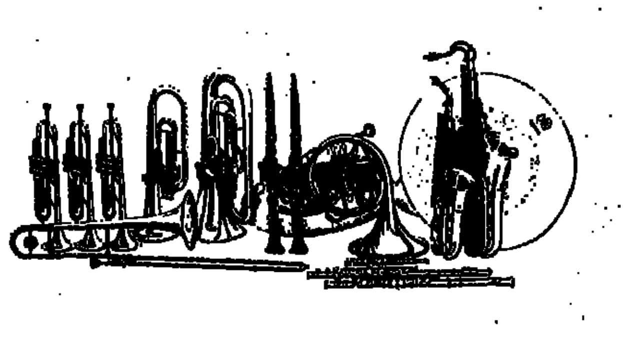
Dedication to the ideal of superlative quality has produced the world-famous range of Yamaha pianos.

In their manufacture only the finest materials are used, and each part is manufactured by Yamaha to the highest possible standards.

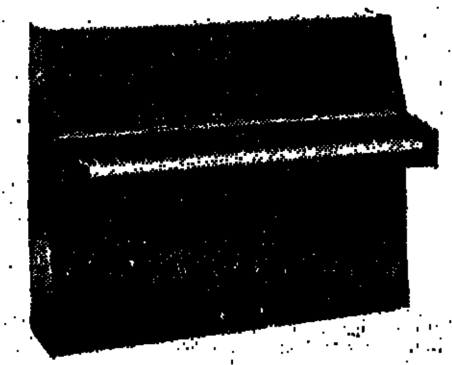
The Yamaha C3B Concert Grand is an instrument renowned for its superb constancy of tone and responsiveness of touch, providing a degree of richness, subtlety and clarity to satisfy the most demanding concert performer.

The Yamaha M5E is a further example of the high standard of Yamaha craftsmanship, with special reference to the accuracy and directness of action combined with tonal constancy and overall durability.

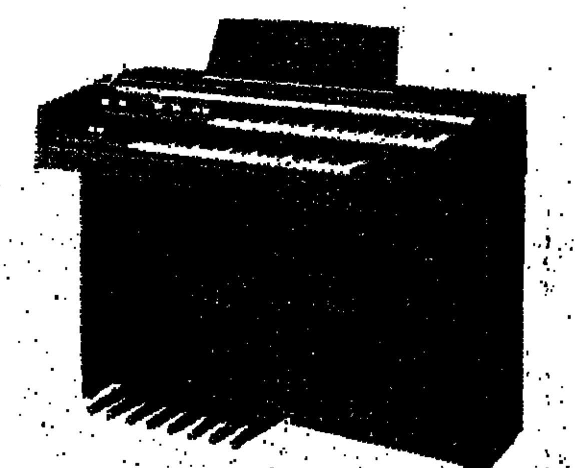




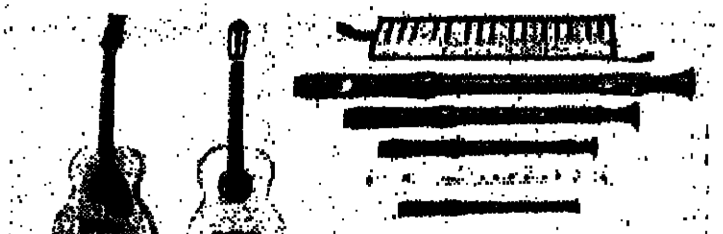
To cater for the complete needs of school and club orchestras, Yamaha provides a comprehensive selection of musical instruments of all types: classical guitars, recorders, percussion, brass and wind instruments, all made from materials carefully selected at source for their perfect quality and crafted by experts to unrivalled standards of tolerance and finish.



The Kemble Classic—an all-British piano, from the largest manufacturers in the United Kingdom, that offers outstanding value and exceptional quality. Recent advances in design and production ensure consistently high performance and durability, making the Classic an ideal choice for practice rooms.



Already used by over 2 million music students throughout the world, the Yamaha B4DR electronic organ is the ideal 'all-purpose' musical instrument. The amazing versatility and clarity of sound provides the bright 'orchestral' tone so many conventional electronic organs lack. With an outstanding record of reliability and durability the Yamaha B4DR is the perfect accompaniment for every school function and fulfils an unrivalled variety of rôles in school music. As well as an extensive range of music available, the music tutor will also appreciate the 670-page "Practical Guide to Arranging Popular Music" available with this model.



Yamaha brass and woodwind instruments are distributed by Bill Lewington Ltd., of 14 Shaftesbury Ave, London WC2H 8HN.

YAMAHA MUSIC SCHOOLS

MUSIC FOR PLEASURE Using spare time sensibly means being active, doing enjoyable things that take the strain out of every day life and contribute to relaxation and recreation. For this, music, especially of ones own making, is the best basis. The following information will explain how it is possible to learn to play the organ very easily using the right method.

Now-a-days, the Yamaha system is taught in many countries of the world. Millions of children and adults without any previous experience have learned to play in Yamaha Music Schools. If a pupil can hum a tune and likes to tap out a rhythm, then he is going to be able to play the organ.

TEACHING MATERIAL By using effective arrangements the pupil is not disillusioned by having to go through exercises which mean little to him. He simply has fun and enjoyment right from the beginning because learning is made a pleasure. The teaching material is contained in carefully prepared volumes which follow the principle of programmed information. "Step by Step" the pupil is taught how to learn and understand each musical element.

QUALIFIED TEACHING STAFF A teaching method is only as good as its teacher. Teachers using the the Yamaha methods are not only fully acquainted with the basic concept of music, but have received specialist training in Yamaha's unique system.

Diplomas confirm that they have successfully completed the various training courses. Only teachers holding such Diplomas can use the Yamaha method. The name of Yamaha is synonymous with quality and strict adherence to these principles perpetuates their reputation.

Teachers qualifications are renewed annually by the Yamaha Company. Careful attention is paid to developing the pupils' natural asset—his ears—thus listening to any form of music takes on a whole new meaning and composing his own tunes becomes positively child's play.

Where music rules

Cecilia Ditton visits a Hull primary school

"When I was a child at this school, in the thirties, one child had to play a march or a hymn as we marched out of assembly. Ooh, it was horrid. And Sister used to bash away on the piano . . . we had a good percussion band then, but that was about all."

Sister Mary Austin, headmistress of Endsleigh RC Primary in Hull, now goes home every evening with music dinning in her ears, wishing never to hear another note again—until tomorrow.

Most children on leaving the school at the age of nine (Hull operates a three-tier system) are able to play, at the very least, a few notes of music. Many play two or three instruments and are well on the way up the grade ladder. Several have ended up later with further education music scholarships. Only nine out of 33 in the top class, for instance, don't play an instrument, and every child that plays does so every day—at playtime or after school. Music permeates the entire life of the school with football as the only serious rival:

8.30. Already, the sound of sackbuts, recorders, shawms, from a record of Rennaissance dance bands filters through into the playground.

9.00. Assembly. Crosslegged brown and yellow-clad figures listen with rapt attention to the very slow, quiet words of Sr Mary; leap up to collect castanets and bamboo sticks for the donkey (Palm Sunday was approaching) and, in carefully sub-divided and remarkably disciplined rhythms, clatter their way out of the hall.

10.40. The playground fills—or, rather, half fills: two large recorder groups hurry to the music room which is hung with certificates, charts, photographs (competition, motivation, achievement count for a lot here) mobiles, open books, record sleeves. "Right. First notes." An almost unisonic F. "Let's go. Are you standing on both feet?" "What was the worst thing you did then?" The children have to be their own judges. Five to sevens play "Three Marys" in two parts and eights and nines play Handel's march from Rinaldo in three parts.

12.30. Lunchtime. The orchestra—40 children from five to nine years old—takes about 10 minutes to get itself ready. ("If they don't come, I don't chase them—unless it's for a function. Then I have to get fierce.") "Listen carefully to the A and see if yours matches. I don't want to have to go all round." They practice Brian Bonsor's Winter and the Skye Boat Song for a forthcoming music festival where they'll compete with Junior Highs—up to 14-year-olds.

A strong singing quality comes from even the youngest of the string players, in broad warm phrases. Some of the recorder players follow the stage directions just a bit too closely. The percussionists do not, on the whole, overdo it. Sr Mary is at the piano. She does not conduct them; it is all done by listening and there is great chamber music rapport. In odd moments, while she is giving out the music, she plays short phrases on the piano and six- and seven-year-olds pick out an interrupted, a perfect, or a plagal cadence.

1.30. A class of seven or so eight and nine-year-old guitarists (two guitar groups and two recorder groups practise each lunch hour) play under the direction of Sister Ann-Marie, who has a scale post [illegible] playing in a three-part ensemble at a local exhibition of early instruments and music. Beginners strum and accompany on open strings, but soon learn to pick out parts and play in classical style. Sr Ann-Marie thinks this is easier and more useful musically at this stage.

1.45. A group of five to six-year-old recorder players try to perfect the first three notes of Three Blind Mice. It is the round tone that matters at this stage, and teacher plays the rest. A bit later on, they will start to amass stars on individual cards, decorated with their names and an anthropomorphic recorder—one per scale or arpeggio.

Singing goes on, as usual, in the weekly class music lesson and pitch is all important. There is even a list of names up in the music room, under the heading "I can sing in tune", and it grows weekly. Competition and incentive again; you can not get into the choir unless you are on the list. "Well, it's like running. Some get there faster than others and there's great rejoicing among them when one sings a G in tune for the first time." So the choir sing perfectly in tune, are rebuked for their native accents ("It's 'overcarst'—drop yer jaw") and, again, have to discover for themselves if anyone is singing a wrong note.

Sister Mary Austin with a group of children from Endsleigh RC Primary School, Hull.

It is not every music teacher's way, nor is it everybody's ideal. But the enthusiasm of the children is boundless. Several have to be strongly urged to go out at playtime and in the lunch hour and on Wednesday evenings they can come back for more, playing in the weekly recorder club with people of all ages.

Seventy-five per cent of those who start an instrument carry on with it. Sr Mary is fortunate in having fairly highly motivated children, from all types of social background. But she admits to a sneaking hankering to try her hand in a tougher school.

Remember Gulbenkian at the end of last year? "The role of the class music teacher goes far beyond the identification of talent. The class music teacher must be intimately concerned in the whole process of sparking off individual talent."

And for Sr Mary Austin, what does it all add up to? "Well, if I sat down and thought about it, I suppose it would all be about communicating, relaxing, spiritual discipline. For me, it's the thing I can do best—and it gets me out of history."

Sing a Song
compiled by Wendy Bird & Gary MacAuliffe

The classroom songbook that all teachers can use.

Sing a Song is
easy-to-use — very simple accompaniments mean that even non-musical teachers can encourage informal classroom singing. flexible — stories, background notes and suggestions for follow-up activities make Sing a Song useful right across the curriculum.

A challenge to the system

By Paul Farmer

For some time now sociologists have been talking about the social construction of knowledge: in other words, they have claimed that knowledge is not just there to be acquired or ignored, but is something which people create; in this way they suggest that what counts as knowledge in our society rather depends on those in control.

It seems to me that music education is a good example of a subject where this construction of knowledge has indeed occurred, where those at the top of the educational tree have fashioned a model of music education which has remained the same for a great many years, and which is only just beginning to be effectively challenged.

The most powerful influence on any educational subject over the past 100 years has of course been examinations, of which music as a subject has had its fair share: from the first grades of the exam boards to the almost legendary multiplicity of diplomas. And as with all forms of testing, the danger of the test influencing rather than just testing what is taught is very great. Where it does influence what is taught, the test or exam usually has a restricting effect on the teaching, with lesson after lesson geared specifically to the examination syllabus, to the exclusion of everything else. The concentration for months on three mediocre pieces, and a handful of scales and ear tests will be only too familiar to many.

But there is worse to come. What if there are some things about the subject which cannot be tested? What if skills and abilities exist which cannot be measured? The effect of the examination which has to exclude these skills is also surely to exclude them from the lesson too, since many teachers feel that what does not appear in the examination cannot be worth bothering with.

It is perhaps for this reason that so many traits of what we would now consider a "musical" person have not been encouraged over the years, while other techniques have been continuously handed down through the examination system. For example, how many people who consider themselves musicians are actually able to improvise or compose effectively? These are not skills which have been encouraged by the music educational establishment. Yet those same people can no doubt write out scales in many different keys, know a great many Italian terms, and can write an "answer" to a given musical phrase—providing it is only four bars of course.

Perhaps the most glaring example of music educationists constructing knowledge has been in GCE exams. For many years it has been possible to gain a pass at O level without even being able to play an instrument, with the great majority of work in the exam being of a general academic nature. Even where A level has pre-required a grade 6 Associated Board pass, no further credit has been given for performance, even to the candidate who holds a performer's diploma!

But of course the worst effect of such an examination system has been on the school syllabuses themselves, so that academic work about music has come to be regarded in the fourth and fifth years of secondary schools as more important than practical work, and the effect that this has had on talented but non-academic musicians may have been very damaging.

These school examinations have also had an effect on the non-practical work of music departments, with the range of music they deal with being restricted, at least to serious western styles, thus effectively stifling music departments who want to deal in the many other aspects of musical culture and at the same time be involved with examinations.

The most obvious example of this is the small place that pop music has been given in O level and even CSE syllabuses, reflecting the taboo nature of that aspect of music among many music teachers. The fairly recent development of the use of pop music in music education has certainly not come about because of any encouragement by the examination boards themselves. Indeed, to judge from current syllabuses, where it appears at best as a possible project, pop music might not exist, in spite of the fact that its importance to adolescents supports an enormous and rich industry.

How else can a subject as important to so many pupils not get on to the school curriculum except by the conscious exclusion of it by those in positions of power? Here is perhaps the supreme example of the social destruction of knowledge, for we can be sure that if the study of pop music were to become a major part of O level or CSE music, then music departments would be massively over-subscribed tomorrow. Would it be too cynical of me to suggest that perhaps this is just what is not wanted?

Paul Farmer is head of the faculty of communication studies at The Stoke High School, Ipswich, and writes here in a personal capacity. He is co-author of Pop Workbook (Edward Arnold Ltd), a recently published class textbook on pop.

In the steps of Suzuki

By Peter Crump

Mention "Suzuki piano" in Britain, and few people are likely to understand. But over the past four years I have built up a practice of teaching the piano using and adapting the approach pioneered by Shinichi Suzuki in teaching the violin. Suzuki has himself devised a piano method and I have preferred to decide many details of actual teaching technique and of syllabus for myself.

There seem to be two views of Suzuki teaching: the first is that the true Suzuki teacher is one who not only uses Suzuki's methods exclusively but also the syllabuses published over his name; the second is that the basic idea is the important part, and that individual teachers are free to decide details for themselves. Although primarily a question of semantics one can sympathize with the purists who do not want to see the ideal diluted or modified out of recognition. It is, of course, a familiar conflict.

The main characteristics of the approach are by now quite well-known: start young, involve parents very closely, and learn without reading at the early stages.

The right starting point is when a child will obey a very simple command, such as play a single note on the piano or percussion instrument, and when it will copy exactly what you show it. The child will be able to copy a simple rhythm on a single note with one finger, then learn to play the same rhythm on an adjacent note with the next finger, and then together one after the other.

After, say, four notes taught like this, hands separately, the pupil can then learn to play the same passage, hands together in octaves, and so on to the end of the piece.

Early pieces consist of rhythmical variations on the same tune which for obvious reasons lies under the five fingers. Care is taken to see that the pupil plays on fingertips even if it means playing with vertical fingers. This helps to develop good hand position. Small hands and fingers are no problem nor is it necessary to have a small-size piano.

Children aged between three or four is quite ready to begin. The teacher is not burdened with the complication of reading and at this age one can teach small units one at a time and build up the piece gradually. The units can be very small, sometimes just a single note. At all stages care must be taken to see that the details of the music are learnt as thoroughly as possible.

At these early stages, teaching at the keyboard is combined with listening games, hand-position games, rhythmic work on percussion, and singing. This side of the work is best done in groups.

Parents—usually mothers but frequently fathers—and also observers who are always welcome, are closely involved. In fact their enthusiasm is vital, for they must work with the children at home, to reinforce what was done at the lesson. They must also ensure that learning becomes an integral part of their children's lives, as normal as eating and sleeping, in short provide a positive environment of music learning. The approach is, of course, directed by adults, and

Making music in Manchester

By Hilary Finch

Moston, a northern suburb of Manchester, is full of matchstalk men and matchstalk cats and dogs. And a church converted into a foam cushion warehouse, a school turned timberyard, iron railway bridges, chip shops—and one of the liveliest music centres in the north.

In what used to be St Mary's Rectory, Allan Jones, leader of Manchester's north music centre, has his office, its walls covered with maps of the area, charts with symbols of all colours and sizes indicating schools, subjects, units and venues for all the music going on in the area.

Next door is the electronic music studio, a piano and recorder practice room, and a common room for the staff of 20. Upstairs are rooms for organ, strings, guitar, wind, percussion and brass tuition—and a library called the Belfry. The librarian is Brian A. Tippler.

A music centre in Manchester is not, primarily, a place. The north centre is, in fact, the only one of Manchester's six centres to have its own building; the rest have office space in schools. They were formed to supplement and augment the instrumental work in Manchester's schools, through developing the basic peripatetic system and through curriculum projects. There are two centres in the north of Manchester, two in the east, one in the south and one in the west.

The staff of 100, under their leader, organize and advise all the music going on in that area: between them they see 16,000 children a week. They go into schools, teach, advise, run projects, and the children use the centres for practice and tuition during the day, in the evenings and at weekends. There is so much music going on—of every type—that some children are playing every night in different groups—from swing bands to recorder consorts.

When Allan Jones took over the north centre in 1974 its only performing unit was an orchestra, which had sectional practices every Saturday morning in the Central High School for Girls. He decided to start a concert band, too, to give wind players more practice—and then a brass band as well. Now his is the only centre to boast three large units—and music (or sound, at least) comes from every corner of the school from 9.30 onwards each Saturday morning. I went up to Manchester recently to have a look at what was happening.

In a hall on the right as I came in the concert band (children from about a dozen different schools) under Malcolm Cockerill, a senior brass teacher, were in full blow; down the corridor, string sections of the junior and intermediate orchestras led by David Wainwright, (deputy leader of the Gorton centre, string teacher, swing band leader and ethnic music adviser) were scraping away at a work by the local composer, Thomas Pitfield, practising for his 75th birthday concert on May 6.

To the right, next door to the coffee break room (manned by parents), a small intermediate wind group was valiantly chugging through the slow movement of Brahms's Third Symphony, led by Brian Tippler, Allan Jones's deputy.

To the left, a double bass class was growling away, and after the break, the string section of the senior orchestra were to meet with the wind and brass of the concert band for a full orchestral rehearsal. In yet another room, the youngest string players, conducted by David Wainwright's wife, Pam, were playing the Muppets theme.

The parents' involvement is by no means limited to making coffee and running jumble sales: there were several adults in the concert band alone—as well as two players from Chethams, three from Salford College of Technology, one or two on vacation from university and a 12-year-old boy, with only one arm and one leg, from a special school, blowing away at a trumpet.

Any adult can take part in a Saturday morning's session if he holds a "study card": it admits the holder, on enrolment, to most adult education classes, music centres and youth clubs and make him a member of the local community education centre. A brightly coloured, interfolded set of leaflets (Manchester is particularly hot on its publicity and has a talented designer in Jill Lovatt) describes the hundreds of possibilities to learn, play, sing—with all ages and at all times and places.

This determination to involve everyone in every area has manifested itself particularly in the last six months in the Music in the Community scheme. Last summer, Mike Godwin, from Manchester's cultural service department asked Allan Jones what he could do to provide outlets for the youth musicians of Manchester and, at the same time, to bring music to the more musically deprived areas of north Manchester.

In the electronic music studio

Allan Jones said he'd set up the concerts if Mike Godwin would provide the venues, and October, November, January, February saw the first series of four concerts—of light orchestral music swing, dance, and brass bands. They advertised in local libraries, old people's and youth clubs—and the response was encouraging.

Audiences ranged between 70 and 200, some people came to all four, and a club in Moston has asked them to come back with more. An audience is gradually being wooed, but, says, Allan Jones, "you've got to entertain them, or they won't come again—use the word orchestra and they'll run a mile, but when you put the word "swing" in, it's a different matter."

Smaller units of recorder consorts, string quartets, brass ensembles play in schools and parish halls: but the audience there tends so far to be mainly parents and friends. Another series of Music in the Community concerts is planned for next year with a bigger than ever publicity campaign; they plan to place [illegible] all the backstreet shops [illegible] to reach those who are not [illegible] to look at notice boards [illegible] through piles of literature [illegible] public library.

Back in the schools, one of the music centres' most important [illegible] is the running of curriculum projects. In a typical project, a [illegible] of four or five teachers from the centres will go into a secondary school, and, together with the head of department, will take the whole of a year on a practically biased course, teaching groups of children who have not already opted for music through their own particular instrument.

The class teacher stays and learns too: he is left with teaching material to use, say, 10 minutes a [illegible] the end of a set period each child will have the option to carry on learning the instrument; even if he does not, he will have become closely acquainted with the feel, the timbre, the difficulties of its [illegible] if he never plays again, he is bound to listen in a different way; he will be trained for concert-going as much as for playing.

Among the many projects so far have been electronic workshops, steel drums, guitars, Orff methods, strings, recorders, dance—each carefully structured and often leading to the performance of a particular work or works.

It struck me that, in all this, there was far more instrumental than vocal activity going on. Allan Jones thought it was partly because class teachers tend to think that singing is their domain—and that they are quite competent to do it alone and without help. Neither do they encourage singers as much as instrumentalists to go out and join groups.

There have been singing projects: Ron Davies runs one and writes his own music—this year they are doing something about early Britons—but, as yet, choral and vocal music is nothing like as highly developed, which is a great pity. The voice is a child's first and most personal instrument: it can have an almost less repertoire — and it costs nothing.

They are now starting to think about a project on church music working with various church music foundations, running courses and giving performances in the cathedral. This should be the chance for the voice to come into its own—and who knows what might develop from there?

If the instrumental projects and units with their comprehensive scope and burgeoning life are anything to go by, there are great hopes for the future.

though there is a place for undirected exploration and self-expression (some children's compositions are very interesting) it is not an approach for those with liberal views.

On the other hand children must be happy, and be fed no more than they can take (which can be much more than one might suppose, or very little) and not forced. This is why the emphasis must be on environment.

One part of the environment is a recording of the whole syllabus which is issued to each parent to play regularly. Suzuki's aim is to teach a child to play an instrument in as far as possible the same way as it learns to talk—by listening and imitating. The only difference is the necessity of communicating the technique of playing a musical instrument. As it is normal to expect all children to learn to speak, all children are considered to be suitable pupils. On principle I never give aptitude tests, and while some learn quicker than others, no child has let me down.

A sense of community among all pupils is also very important. Unlike the violin, the piano is a lonely instrument (though duet playing can modify the loneliness a little). We try to compensate with public and private concerts, parties, theory workshops for older children at weekends. Equally important is the sense of community among parents—meetings are arranged for them too.

To return to the syllabus, the early octave pieces give way to increasingly more advanced pieces. Each piece must be learnt thoroughly and kept in the memory and children should be able to sit down and play everything they have learnt at one go. If any piece is shaky it must be revised; given the right environment described above this does not cause boredom or impatience.

Reading is introduced gradually. The names of notes are taught as soon as feasible, when children know the alphabet, I have no hesitation in writing letter names over the notes at the start.

From about five and a half to six years old, music reading is taught on a regular basis. It must be stressed that early memory learning and emphasis on listening does not predispose a child against music reading.

What kind of results do we get? Several five year old pupils have been able to play the first Minuet in G from the Anna Magdalena Notebook, currently in the Associated Board's Grade 1 syllabus, and to date two have been able to play it while still four. Children of six have been able to play two of Beethoven's Bagatelles from Opus 119 (Nos 2 in C major, and 5 in C minor). I have a five-year-old who can play these two pieces, and also Clementi's Sonatina in C, Opus 36 No. 3.

But of course by no means every child reaches these standards at these ages. Nor does this matter: it is considered axiomatic that all children will get to these points in their own good time, and that it is far more important to give a child a secure repertoire than to cultivate pyrotechnics with unsound foundations.

What about objections? One concerns non-reading, but I hope I have dispelled any doubts about this. Another objection is the supposed narrowness of the approach, but the answer here is that it is possible to broaden out at the same time as sticking to the method, and I frequently do.

A third objection is that children aged four, for example, are too young to know what they want, and should wait until they are old enough to decide for themselves before they start learning. It is not entirely true, in fact, that a child of four is too young to decide. In any case why should they decide for themselves, since they do not decide whether or not they learn to read or write? Children can be put off, or made unhappy, by being forced, but force has no place in Suzuki.

But the Suzuki approach is more than just a teaching technique. It is often described as an education with stress laid on the effect on a child's emotional and intellectual development. In addition to this, I find it both deep and fascinating with teachers, parents and children able to discover a great deal about themselves.

As far as I am concerned, the principle of in loco parentis is taken to its logical conclusion. The distinction between parent and teacher is blurred. Professional reserve on the part of the teacher is inappropriate, which is one reason why it is hard to see Suzuki methods working well in school.

Marching bands

Andrée Brooks on a phenomenon that helps to keep school music alive in the US.

The highly polished brass of their trumpets and horns glistened in the early afternoon sunlight as they precision-marched up and down the field.

Their uniforms, a rich black with gold trimmings, added contrast to the proceedings. Meanwhile, a perfectly synchronized musical blast from their combined instruments thundered piercingly through the stands.

For all 154 proud participants in the award-winning marching band of Trumbull High School—about 70 miles north of New York City—it was a display and an occasion to remember.

Like dozens of other bands all over the United States, this one is thriving—the amazingly successful survivor of those radical years of iconoclasm when so many similar activities with a traditional taint were shunned and taunted by the anti-establishment hordes.

The bands are now emerging from this period stronger and more popular than ever, unscathed even by recent financial cutbacks in peripheral school ventures in America that have squeezed out so many other programmes.

Why? Robert Clowes, a vice-president of the United States National Bands Association, says: "They have always had a show-biz appeal that overcame everything. Communities love them. They are a local status symbol. And after all, there is nothing quite like the impact of a mass of players coming right at you in the stands! And the kids love to participate—to dress up in those uniforms and parade. It appeals to the ham in them all".

Robert Myers, a music professor at the University of Bridgeport, who teaches marching band techniques to high school music instructors, believes they are a great, even a serious asset to the overall appeal of music in schools today.

"It is", he says, "an excellent way of mixing discipline with fun. Marching provides variety which will tend to keep students interested in the music programme. In fact, a marching band may appeal to some students who would have no interest otherwise—the glamour of those uniforms, their own instruments, the dramatic performance. It is very attractive."

Mr Clowes believes the value of marching band goes even further. "The type of breathing needed in moving and playing at the same time improves breath control in wind instrument players. The memorization needed for the music improves mental skills. And the sort of ballet that emerges from their formations and patterns helps total motor coordination which, in turn, makes for better musicians. They also develop extraordinary powers of concentration."

The marching band in American high schools has been around since the early twenties. It evolved out of the military band at a time when music was just being introduced into the regular school curriculum and there was a need for a band to play at football games and parades. At first it was just a copy of the military idea using military music, uniforms and formations.

Gradually in the 40s and 50s popular music and show tunes were introduced, uniforms became more colourful and diversified and the shift was towards a show business approach. New and experimental patterns and formations included lavish ideas such as a car with turning wheels, a river boat, a spelt-out slogan, and even an engine with real smoke rising from the smoke-stack.

Lately there has been a movement back towards the original military idea both in music and formation. It is called the new "drum corps style". Emphasis is now on massed sound, precision marching and synchronized movements with stirring music to go with it.

Today more than 2,000,000 high school students in America are in marching bands—double the number 10 years ago. According to Mr Clowes, the size of each band has also risen sharply from about an average of fifty players in the 60s to more than 250 "in the mid-west states like Illinois, Minnesota and further south in Texas, where the marching band has always been especially strong."

His organization has also noted a four-fold increase in the past decade in the number of contests available to high school bands. These are sponsored by various colleges, commercial concerns such as McDonald's and Disneyland (which now hires members of high school

After Gulbenkian —what?

David Cawthra, senior lecturer in music at Exeter University, was recently appointed warden of the music-in-education section of the Incorporated Society of Musicians. We publish here an extract from the speech he made on the occasion of his appointment

I've long been concerned about the "parallelism" of our higher musical education in this country: either conservatoire or university, and for too long ne'er the twain have met. (I feel it's perpetuated, to some extent—unwittingly, no doubt—in the recent Gulbenkian report.) I'm sometimes afraid that, in both areas, we are in danger of operating under false pretences, misdirecting young people towards non-existent careers. We all should know just how many conservatoire graduates will actually earn their living on the concert platform—and how many university graduates will actually become postgraduates and then make a living as scholars.

Another worry is that still today in 1978, it depends entirely on where you happen to be born as to what will be your musical opportunities. Don't be dazzled by the handful of excellent youth orchestras; not when Plymouth, seventh largest city in England, has this year appointed its first string peripatetic teacher.

I was brought up in a school where music equalled singing. Some think that the pendulum has swung too far in the other direction. But there's no denying that most of the older generation were consigned to a musical scrapheap if they failed to get into the school choir at the age of 10 or so. And we wonder why local councillors appear to have so little sympathy or understanding where the arts are concerned.

It is not insignificant, I think, that so many music students I have known over the past 12 years, are determined to go back into school work, in order to try to see music fulfilling the full role for which it is uniquely fitted. What a pity, then, that I have yet to meet a student teacher who has not regarded 90 per cent of the course as an almost complete waste of time, with precious little attention paid to what to do when the class bangs its combined desks and tables.

I gather that music and religious education are indeed the two least popular subjects at school—but that music and maths are the two easiest to get a job in. What a challenge. After reading 450 UCCA forms in each of the past 10 years, it is clear that music therapy and arts administration are popular "growth points" in the ambitions of young musicians today. But the opportunities here, too, are terribly limited; as for the former, the medical profession itself is divided over its recognition; while in arts administration courses, they ask for applicants with some experience, while prospective employers, less surprisingly, want qualified people.

I was delighted when this music-in-education section was formed—I was a passionate supporter of the change—but it's truly daunting to contemplate the vast area of musical activity and presence which we ought to represent. Naturally, we have the largest membership in the ISM (even though only a handful had time to answer that recent questionnaire). The MMA was my way into the ISM (as with so many of us)—it's had a fine recruiting record, whatever its detractors may say. But it is worrying that we have so little state school representation (especially primary).

That's where attention must be paid and hope laid, where children's musical talent can be identified and developed, but where they can also be told, nice and early, that they won't make the grade. (As Moray Welsh said last year, music isn't just fun—it's damned hard work, and fiercely competitive too.) There, in the primary school, is where young people can begin to know about music as well as the violin, and perhaps even discover the vast and exciting world which lies behind their half-dozen pages of the latest grade pieces they're learning.

It doesn't need me to point out that we are working at a time of educational transition—and also in an age of instant news. And you can't get instant news from transition. This year, the committee is going to be surrounded by Green Papers, Gulbenkian reports, N and F proposals, comparative GCE syllabuses etc. etc. There's clearly no lack of subject-matter for our first section day conference in the autumn.

Perhaps music is such a new subject, both in schools and in universities, that we don't yet know what and how we want to teach (and to whom), even if we know why. Is its scope too wide for us to handle? Certainly it needs protagonists who are prepared to fight head teachers—and anyone else who gets in the way.

marching bands for summer playing) and civic organizations soliciting the services of the best of local [illegible] for parades and events.

"[illegible]," says Mr Clowes, "have been a primary cause of greater sophistication and higher standards in all aspects of the marching band."

It is now a multi-million dollar industry; music publishers are putting out special marching arrangements and technique books for suitable formations to go with the music (these are becoming so intricate they are now sometimes even referred to as "choreography"); summer camps which have two-week or month-long "clinics" for band members as well as drum majorettes and cheerleaders; and universities which offer a variety of summer music courses especially designed for members of marching bands and their leaders.

"There is yet a further tendency as a reflection of interest generated in history by the recent bicentennial and the rise of ethnic fascination there has been a move to make uniforms more in tune with local history or community background.

But these bands are not without problems in spite of their high popularity. Because of the general financial squeeze band leaders are now increasingly forced to turn to the community for additional funds for the expensive uniforms and instruments.

And Mr Clowes has noted that "rehearsals are more difficult to schedule today because so many students have commitments outside of school—like part-time jobs or special activities that increase their chances of getting into good colleges".

Even so Mr Myers sees these bands growing even stronger in the future because they fulfil a fundamental need, "providing students with a sense of pride in his town or school and a sense of teamship that is hard to match in any other musical endeavour".

For more detailed information on marching band music or techniques write to: American Music Conference, 332 South Michigan Avenue, Chicago, Ill. 60604.

Please apply by letter only to the Headmaster at the school as soon as possible, enclosing all the usual details of career and names and addresses of two referees.

LONDON, E.C.2
CENTRAL FOUNDATION BOYS' SCHOOL
Cowper Street, London EC2A 4AP
(near Old Street Station)
Required to begin in September, a GRADUATE TEACHER of PHYSICS in this three-form entry voluntary aided boys' school. Central Foundation is a grammar school which, in accordance with the Authority's policy, took its first all-ability intake into the first year in September, 1977. The school will thus be gradually reorganized as a small comprehensive school over the next few years.

A large number of boys take Physics at Ordinary and Advanced levels of the G.C.E. and a share of the work at these levels is available for candidates of appropriate qualifications and experience. The exact nature of the teaching duties would be a matter for discussion with the successful applicant.

A Scale 2 post is available for a candidate of appropriate qualifications and experience, but the position would also be of interest to newly qualified applicants.

Please apply, by letter only, to the Headmaster at the school, enclosing the usual details of qualifications and experience and the names of two referees.

EUROPEAN SCHOOL
CULHAM OXFORDSHIRE

The school which is planned to open in September, 1978, will be the first European School in this country. It will cater primarily for the children of staff working on the European Community's JET (Joint European Tours) Project at Culham. The school will be a day school organized in linguistic sections and pupils will be taught partly in their own language, partly in languages of other EEC countries.

Initially the number of pupils will be small and mainly in the nursery, primary and lower secondary age range but eventually it is expected that there will be about 600 pupils in the 4-18 age range. Those who complete the secondary course will take the European School's own leaving certificate, the European Baccalaureate.

The Department of Education and Science, Welsh Office Education Department, Scottish Education Department and Department of Education for Northern Ireland invite applications from experienced, qualified teachers for the following posts which are expected to be available in the European School at Culham in September, 1978.

NURSERY
The Nursery Section will initially cater for children of various EEC nationalities. One teacher is required. A knowledge of French or German would be an advantage.

PRIMARY
Two teachers are required for the English Language Section:
i. A teacher with an interest in English Mother Tongue and language development.
ii. A teacher with an interest in the teaching of science and mathematics in junior schools.
For both posts, readiness to teach English as a Foreign Language is essential.

Salaries will be in the range of:—

Nursery	£5,900-£10,500
Primary	£6,400-£12,000

Other allowances are also payable details of which will be provided on application. Appointments will initially be for two years.

During service in European Schools teachers' incremental rights are preserved.
Teachers will be members of a multi-national team and knowledge of a Community language other than English is therefore desirable.

Application forms and further details are available as follows:
For candidates in England and Wales, Room 3/40, Department of Education and Science, Elizabeth House, York Road, London SE1 7PH (Tel.: 01-928 9222, ext. 3416/3208).
For candidates in Scotland, Room 441, Scottish Education Department, New St. Andrews House, Edinburgh EH1 3SY (Tel.: 031-556 8400, ext. 5248).

For candidates in Northern Ireland, Room 503, Department of Education for Northern Ireland, Rathgael House, Balloo Road, Bangor, Co Down BT19 2PR (Tel.: Bangor 66311, ext. 292).

Applications will be sought separately from UK teachers currently serving in the European Schools.

CLOSING DATE FOR RECEIPT OF COMPLETED APPLICATION FORMS IS MAY 5.

SHEFFIELD
TODWICK GRANGE SCHOOL
Aston S31 0DL
Group 4(S)
Appointment of HEADMASTER/MISTRESS.

Todwick Grange is a residential children's centre which was opened in 1968 and is provided by Sheffield's Family and Community Services Department.

Since the opening of the Centre, Sheffield Education Committee has provided educational facilities, but the Department of Education and Science has now authorised those facilities to be recognised as a separate special school for maladjusted pupils from 1st September, 1978.

That special school will be a day school and the staff will be appointed by, and responsible to, the Education Committee. They will not be required to undertake any residential duties.

Although the Centre has residential facilities for 50 children, some of them go out to ordinary schools and the numbers in attendance at Todwick Grange School are likely to vary between 25 and 40 boys and girls between six and 16 years of age.

Applications are invited from TEACHERS experienced in work with emotionally disturbed pupils and with a real interest and knowledge of their educational, emotional, and social problems. The ability to work with colleagues from other disciplines is essential and an appropriate advanced qualification in special education will be an advantage.

Todwick Grange is in a country area, approximately 12 miles from the City Centre. The school is in a separate building which has been adapted for educational purposes.

Salary will be in accordance with Group 4(S).

Apply by letter giving full curriculum vitae and the names and addresses of two referees to the Chief Education Officer, P.O. Box 67, Leopold Street, Sheffield S1 1RJ, by 28th April.

SHEFFIELD
MAUD MAXFIELD SCHOOL
Ringinglow Road, Sheffield S11 [illegible]

Applications are invited from qualified TEACHERS of the DEAF for appointment as DEPUTY HEAD TEACHER of this day and residential school for 100 deaf pupils between three and 16+ years of age as a result of the retirement of Mr. J. D. Taylor on 31st August, 1978.

Maud Maxfield School is in modern buildings in a delightful area on the outskirts of the city and, although it includes facilities for boarders, residential duties are not normally required of the Deputy Head Teachers.

In order to improve the opportunities for pupils in the secondary age range, plans are now being developed for a unit for deaf pupils in a neighbouring secondary school and when that unit is completed it will operate closely with the Maud Maxfield School.

In addition to the pupils within the Maud Maxfield School itself, the school provides a service for the 13 partially hearing units throughout the city and also through its peripatetic service for hearing impaired children in normal schools. The Deputy Head Teacher shares in the leadership of this part of the city's comprehensive provisions for the hearing impaired, and also in the preparation of colleagues for qualifying examinations for teachers of the deaf as part of a considerable in-service training programme organised through the Maud Maxfield School.

The salary will be in accordance with Deputy Head Teacher Scale Group 7(S).

Apply by letter giving full curriculum vitae and the names and addresses of two referees to the Chief Education Officer, P.O. Box 67, Leopold Street, Sheffield S1 1RJ, by 28th April.

The T.E.S. goes to work.

The TES now provides on its "School to Work" page each week, specialist news coverage of the developing – and controversial – relationship between education and industry and the transition from school to work.

Industry and education need to know about each other. They also need to keep tabs on the rapidly growing activities of the agencies and organizations, public and voluntary, that deal with young people.

The "School to Work" page supplements the attention being paid throughout the paper to the needs and interest of industrial trainers, careers specialists, youth workers, and all those concerned with equipping the young for a full adult role.

The Times Educational Supplement's coverage of education has always been broad, and it has regarded industrial training and youth affairs as part of its field. In the past two years the growing national and professional concern has been reflected in the increased space and prominence given throughout the paper to these matters. The most important developments and initiatives by central government and others, such as the new national programme for school leavers, are often disclosed or foreshadowed in the TES before you can learn about them from any other source.

TES – The weekly for news about education at all levels – including vocational training.

THE OPEN UNIVERSITY

The Community Education Section of the Post Exeprience Courses Unit is developing courses to meet needs for information and personal decision-making skills within defined areas of adult 'life-concerns'. The courses are produced in collaboration with external agencies by teams of academics, and designers, editors and BBC staff. Courses are designed to be accessible to a wide audience without comprising academic standards.

Lecturers in Community Education
Post Nos. 3311 and 3470

Two lecturers are sought to wor kas members of the teams which will produce two new courses for first presentation in October, 1979, respectively 'Childhood 5-10' and 'Health Choices'.

Applicants should have a commitment and proven skills in communication techniques relevant to the design of multimedia distance learning materials.

Backgrounds in one or more of the following areas are required:
- Personal relationships/family dynamics—with an emphasis on methods of self-assessment and behavioural change.
- Health education—with an emphasis on effective learning methods for physical and emotional health.
- Education and community work—with focus on parental involvement child centred projects and home-school links.
- Social analysis of life crises—from a sociological of psychological perspective.

The posts are available immediately for two years, and are based at the Open University headquarters in Milton Keynes, Buckinghamshire. Post 3470 is funded by the Scottish Health Education Unit, and in addition to course writing duties, the postholder will be responsible to maintain contact between the Open University and the Scottish Health Education Unit. In order to do his regular and occasionally exensive travel to and within Scotland will be required.

Post No. 3477

An essential part of the Community Education courses is the encouragement given to students to form self-help groups in which they exchange experiences and discuss the course materials. For each course a nationwide network of co-ordinators is organized with the help of organisations with which we are collaborating. The postholder will be responsible for co-ordinatingll the development and organisation of these networks and for liaison with our collaborators.

In addition to the organisation of self-help groups the Community Education Section is interested in encouraging the widest possible use of the course material, especially by those who are educationally disadvantaged. There are a number of projects that are making a special effort to reach people who do not come into traditional adult education, and the postholder wil be responsible for developing links with such projects and assessing ways in which the materials developed by the University might support such activities.

A background in community or social work with an orientation to community development and/or work with educationally disadvantaged groups is required. Ability to liaise with volunteers and professionals at all levels is essential.

Salaries for all these posts on the lecturer scale within the range £3,333 to £4,190 (under review), except in cases of secondment.

For further particulars please send a postcard quoting the post number and reference (LHCZ) to the Personnel Manager, The Open University, P.O. Box 75, Walton Hall, Milton Keynes, MK7 6AL, or telephone Milton Keynes 63868 (24-hour answering service).

Closing date for applications 5th May, 1978.

THE OPEN UNIVERSITY
SCHOOLS COUNCIL
Curriculum Course Development

Two course team members are required by the Open University to work on the course, Curriculum Review and Pupil Assessment, to be presented for the first time in 1981.

The course is being developed in collaboration with the Schools Council. It is intended to provide classroom teachers with practical guidance in reviewing and improving the learning and teaching approaches which they use, and in assessing their pupils' performance.

The materials which the team will produce include correspondence texts, TV and radio programmes and broadcast notes and assignments and examinations.

Applicants should have a good honours degree or equivalent and experience of teaching in primary or secondary schools. Experience in curriculum development in schools or in school-based or school-focused in-service activities is important. Candidates should be able to provide evidence of an ability to write for publication and should be familiar with existing curriculum development projects and materials.

The appointments are for 2 years; the usual method of appointment is by secondment where the University pays the appointee's salary plus any subsequent increases/increments that occur during the period of the secondment.

Further particulars and an application form are available, by postcard request please, from The Personnel Manager (LCD3), The Open University, P.O. Box, 75, Walton Hall, Milton Keynes MK7 6AL, or by telephone from Milton Keynes 63868. Closing date for applications: 5 May, 1978.

A responsible and challenging post . . .

Second Deputy Principal

EXETER

SALARY £5,256 to £6,288 (inclusive of supplements)

Northbrook Community Home is a residential school, with education on the premises, catering for 60 boys aged 14 years and over. It is situated in its own grounds of some 20 acres on the outskirts of Exeter, which is a focal point for a wide variety of community based activities.

We are seeking a qualified person, with proven administrative ability, who will be capable of playing an important role in the present management team, accepting full responsibility for the whole school and a multi-disciplinary staff team in the absence of the Principal and his first Deputy.

You will also be expected to undertake specific duties concerning the general care of the boys, and should be capable of initiating, implementing and monitoring individual treatment plans based upon modern thinking; implicit in this requirement is the ability to play a full and leading part in the recreational and leisure time of this residential school, and interest, qualifications or experience in a variety of areas would be welcomed, especially in music, drama, major games, outdoor pursuits, craftwork or water-borne activities. Responsibility may also be given for creation and managing a continuous programme of staff training for both qualified and unqualified Residential Social Workers. You would be expected to occupy an unfurnished house on the campus, for which a nominal rent is charged.

Informal inquiries to the Principal, Mr. K. A. C. Harding, Northbrook Community Home, Beacon Lane, Exeter. Tel. 72714.

Application forms are obtainable from the Director of Social Services, County Hall, Exeter. Tel. Exeter 77977, ext. 519

ENJOY A CAREER AS A CAMPAIGN ORGANISER

—AND BENEFIT NEEDY OLD PEOPLE AS A RESULT

Do you have a record of success in your own field. Do you want to use your experience to benefit others and at the same time build your own career in a new and exciting direction?

If so you could be the person for whom we are searching. We will give you full training to enable you to join a small high calibre team raising large sums of money with young people using well-established techniques.

Children are happy to help the old, but their enthusiasm needs a springboard of ideas, initiative, and the ability to motivate others; and organising with applied common sense.

The work involves meeting people, talking to teachers and pupils and organising fund raising events. The work is demanding but full of interest. The hours can be flexible but within clearly defined objectives. There is also the incalculable reward of bringing genuine help to the old and enjoyment to the young, together of course with the opportunity of advancement within an active team.

Salary negotiable dependent on experience, plus car or car allowance. Full driver's licence essential.

Apply in writing with full curriculum vitae to: P.O. Box 4UB, London W1A 4UB, quoting ref: PAP1.

FIELD STUDY CENTRES

SRI LANKA

Applications are invited for the post of:

Adviser on Development of Field Study Centres for Teachers, Ministry of Education, Colombo, Sri Lanka

The British Council has agreed to fill this post under the Aid to Commonwealth Teaching of Science Scheme.

The first Field Study Centre was opened at Peradeniya in 1976 and its success has led to the planning of four further centres in Sri Lanka. The Centres will assist teachers to make maximum use of the school environment and although the emphasis will be on outdoor biology the Centres are expected to cover a broad range. The Centres will also be local curriculum development centres, in-service training centres and teachers' meeting places. In addition to advising the Ministry of Education on the development of further Field Study Centres, the holder of this post will be expected to coordinate the development programme including the possibility of setting up one new Field Study Centre; participating in the running of the Centres; assisting in the courses offered at the Centres; assuming responsibility for the training of Field Centre Officers, and evaluating the effectiveness of in-service teacher training in Field Study Centres.

The successful candidate will have an appropriate science degree and a postgraduate teaching qualification. At least 10 years' experience of teaching including experience of Field Study Centres and/or Teachers Centres, plus experience in curriculum development, is required. Previous overseas experience would be an advantage.

The salary scale is £4,900 to £5,900 and overseas allowances are between £409 and £1,419 depending on family circumstances. Free furnished accommodation overseas, paid passages for family and allowances for children's education will be provided. Appointment will be to the British Council on contract terms initially for two years, with secondment to the Ministry of Education, Sri Lanka: service may be on secondment from a candidate's present employer.

Selection will be by London interviews and board.

Write or telephone, quoting C1 for further details and an application form, to be returned by May 1, 1978, if possible, to Staff Recruitment Department, The British Council, 65 Davies Street, London W1Y 2AA, telephone 01-499 8011, ext. 3041.

Short Courses in Art Education

Three Arts Courses during July 1978

Art for the Elderly

Goldsmiths' College, New Cross, London 7 to 14 July 1978 N203

A course designed for people who have an interest in art for the elderly particularly art lecturers in Adult Education Centres. There will be visits to hospitals and centres for the elderly together with discussions on ways of working.

Drawing as a Means of Learning and Communication in the Primary and Secondary School

Christ's College, Liverpool, 18 to 27 July 1978 N207

This course is about childrens' drawing and is designed to develop teaching skills and an understanding of the role of drawing. There will be practical work and discussion, displays of children's work and talks by teachers who have had success in promoting the use of drawing.

Expressive Arts in the Secondary Curriculum

St. Martin's College, Lancaster, 13 to 20 July 1978 N206

This course is for those working in the Arts in secondary schools. It will explore what elements they have in common in contributing to quality, invention and imagination in secondary education. Applications are invited from specialist teachers of Art, Drama and Music in secondary schools and from lecturers and advisers concerned with the Arts.

Short Courses in Religious Education

Two Residential Religious Education Courses with Some Joint Sessions

St. Martin's College, Lancaster, 24 to 28 July 1978

Religious Education: An Introduction to Recent Developments for the Non Specialist

N286

This course is designed for those who teach religious education in secondary schools but whose main responsibilities and qualifications are in other subjects. The programme will cover recent developments in the study of religion, moral education and religious education and will include practical work based on an extensive exhibition of books and audio-visual material.

The Promotion of Religious and Moral Awareness in the Middle Years

N287

Through lectures, discussion and workshop sessions, four main areas of concern will be considered, planning and evaluating the content of work, teaching about Christianity and other religious faiths, moral education and the particular needs of slow learners. The course will be of interest to lecturers, advisers, head teachers and teachers in junior, JMI, lower secondary and middle schools.

For further details of these and other in-service training courses ring or write to the Department of Education and Science, Short Courses 4/25, Elizabeth House, York Road, London SE1 7PH, telephone 01-928 9222.

E F L SUMMER COURSES

Directors of Studies at £100 weekly plus full board

Residential Tutors at £60 weekly plus full board

Small organisation concerned with residential English language holiday courses for overseas children 8-16 requires tutors and directors of studies to live in, teach English to children in small classes of 10, organise and encourage excursions, games, swimming, arts and crafts, music, and share residential duties. All children are private individual enrolments. Tutors should ideally be graduate teachers between 25-65, with teaching experience in Modern Languages, English or EFL. A qualification in EFL (RSA or IH) a distinct advantage but not essential—drive, intelligence, initiative and a love of children equally important. Capacity for hard work and long hours and an active interest in games, outdoor pursuits, sailing, etc., vital. Must be able to drive.

Directors of Studies. Should have either TEFL qualifications or substantial TEFL teaching experience.

BOROUGH OF HARINGEY

ENGLISH LANGUAGE RESOURCE CENTRE

This Centre is the base for a team of specialist teachers who work throughout the borough with pupils needing help in English as a Second Language and in general language development. These teachers are also involved with in-service training within a multi-cultural context, and they meet together once a week for their own discussion and training.

We would like to appoint the following to join the team as soon as possible:

(I) 2 secondary teachers with experience of British multi-cultural schools and appropriate qualifications (e.g. RSA) in teaching English as a Second Language, to work in one of the borough's comprehensive schools teaching TSL and liaising closely with colleagues within the school.

(II) 1 primary teacher with experience in multi-cultural nursery, infant or junior schools, and experience or qualifications in teaching English as a Second Language. This teacher would be based in one of the borough's primary schools, and would also be involved in in-service training with other schools and teachers.

There will also be a vacancy for a one year appointment at secondary level, to replace a member of staff who is on secondment from September, 1978.

All these posts carry a Scale 2 salary

Further particulars and application forms from the Chief Education Officer, to be returned by 5th May, 1978.

London Allowance (£402) payable.

Removal expenses—100 per cent allowed.

Educational Courses

LONDON

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON
INSTITUTE OF EDUCATION
M.A. IN RIGHTS IN EDUCATION

The major purposes of the course are to increase awareness of rights, to promote understanding of legislation for rights and its effect on education, and to make clear the extent, nature and effects of factors, such as sexrole typing, racial and class stereo-typing, which lead to inequality. Issues concerning rights, the use of legislation and of education to lessen inequalities and unfair discrimination are of increasing importance nationally and internationally.

The course is interdisciplinary and consists of a core course dealing with philosophical, legal, historical and political aspects of rights and a choice of one of three options: the rights of the disadvantaged, the rights of women and girls and the role of Women's Studies, and conflicts of rights.

The course will extend over two years part-time or one year full-time. There will be scope in some parts of the course for work of direct practical application.

The course is open to graduates and non-graduates with appropriate educational qualifications and experience. Apply for further particulars to Mrs. L. Garnier, Advanced Studies Department, University of London Institute of Education, 20 Bedford Way, London, WC1H 0AL.

The ayes and the noes

Frances Hill on the pros and cons of parliament on radio

At long last the listening public can hear the frenzied jeerings and hootings of our members of parliament daily over the airwaves. Like the National Theatre, the broadcasting of parliament was first recommended in far-distant times. Unlike the National Theatre, it is bound rapidly to become an accepted institution, the controversy surrounding it completely forgotten. Not, perhaps, for the reason Mr Leo Amery gave, in 1944, in its favour: that it would enhance the prestige of parliament. That scarcely seems likely, on the evidence of the proceedings broadcast so far. It will be accepted simply because there are no good reasons against it. Those usually given—that broadcasting may change the character of the Commons or the contributions of members, or that parliamentary proceedings may be difficult to follow or give a misleading impression—do not stand up to serious scrutiny.

The "live" broadcasts (Tuesdays and Thursdays, Radio 4, 3.10 pm) of Prime Minister's question time which have gone out so far may have seemed, on the face of it, to justify some of the criticisms. Margaret Thatcher's insistence on repeating her question to the Prime Minister about unemployment three times, last week, was unusual if not unprecedented. Some questions and answers on the previous day were, apparently, longer than usual, according to the Speaker. "I cannot understand why", he said, wryly.

But changes of this kind, induced by the awareness of the listening millions, may not be a bad thing. Mrs Thatcher's persistent charge that our unemployment figures are worse than those of our major competitors drove Mr Callaghan to reply feebly that they are better than those of Canada and Italy. To the inevitable sardonic laughter which greeted this statement he replied "Oh, I see, the major competitors are only those that the Opposition selects" which made him look even more foolish. It does not require allegiance to the Conservative party to enjoy the chance to witness the penetration of the Prime Minister's "well-designed armour", in the phrase of David Holmes, the BBC commentator. In any case the boot will be on the Left foot before long.

As for the difficulty of following parliamentary procedure, this will lessen with time. David Holmes and Brian Curtois gave good, rapid explanations of how question time works in their five-minute introductions to the live broadcasts last week. It was a pity they did not have a little longer to give examples of the formal questions on the order paper and the sorts of more probing questions to which these might lead. Questions and answers about the "Holmes affair", on Tuesday, following a formal question as to why the Prime Minister did not sack David Ennals, were obscure for anyone not already well versed in the matter. Perhaps, at some point in the future, Radio 4 may find extra time before the live broadcasts for the commentator to brief listeners.

But whether "live" broadcasts of this kind are the best means of opening the window on Parliament can be questioned. Edited accounts of last week's question times, in the extended Today in Parliament and Yesterday in Parliament programmes, gave a clearer, if less complete, account of what had happened, and, of course, placed this in the context of the whole day's proceedings. But the drama of hearing "live" broadcasts directly from Parliament with none of the hesitations and background shouting edited out, justfies the exercise. In choosing to restrict it to question time twice weekly Radio 4 seems to have got the amount about right.

Today in Parliament (Radio 4, 11.30 pm) has been lengthened by 15 minutes to half an hour and Yesterday in Parliament (Radio 4, 8.35 am) by 10 minutes, lasting till the news at nine. Both programmes, previously worthy but soporific, have been transformed by the inclusion of actual parliamentary voices. Their musty air has not been completely dispelled, but has been freshened up greatly.

On Tuesday last week, in Today in Parliament, we heard the Lords at their most lordly, voicing their thoughts on whether "assembly" would be the best name for the new "devolved" Scottish parliament. Lord Lauderdale observed, about the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, that "Scotsmen know the general assembly, Scotsmen love the general assembly, Scotsmen revere the general assembly" in accents of forgotten grandeur.

One seemed transported back in time to a world in which the nobility gazed down from their aristocratic pinnacles on to the swarming masses of little men beneath. In the next evening's programme we heard the Lords—and Ladies—at their more humane, as Lady Burton made a plea for the improvement of the nationalized industries. If only "people at the top" were forced to travel by public transport, incognito, for one month out of each year, services would quickly improve, she suggested. These two editions of Today in Parliament gave a more vivid impression of the atmosphere and concerns of the House of Lords than any number of previous programmes.

Perhaps, now attention has been focused on these programmes, the commentary can be made a little livelier. Radio London's mode of presenting question time (Mondays to Thursdays, midnight to 1 am) sets a good example. "The biggest row was over Mrs Thatcher hogging the limelight . . .", said the commentator last week. He explained that Labour members had complained about this before, but that the Tories, on the other hand, argue that the Prime Minister "waffles on" too much. This kind of exegesis often makes much easier, and sometimes more informative, listening than the scrupulously phrased accounts of parliamentary proceedings on Today in Parliament and Yesterday in Parliament.

A case can surely be made for bringing an enlivened Today in Parliament forward to a time before most people are in bed. Perhaps 10.30, after The World Tonight? No doubt there are logistic difficulties, as debates often end late in the evening. But, after all, whatever happens too late to be covered that day can be included in the next morning's programme—as, in fact, is already the case.

Magician or conjurer?

John James reviews 'Ten Times Table'

Ten Times Table (Globe Theatre) has 10 listed characters and a table—which may have something to do with the title of the piece. The stock farcical types are all present: genial but muddled chairman, punctilious local councillor, drunken businessman, ferocious grande dame, moody leftist youth, eccentric ex-military officer, deaf and tottering old woman, bright and dull adoring females. They are all as two-dimensional as they have ever been and no less successful in exciting our willing humour.

They meet round the table to plan a pageant celebrating the spurious martyrdom of The Pendon Twelve, Chartists of a kind put down by the military. Within no time this committee is sharply divided into Left and Right. The local Marxist teacher and male chauvinist pig extraordinary, rallies the unions, captivates the two contrasted females, bribes the schoolboys and recruits the yobbos into his "proletariat" for what he dubs "the rally".

All this leaves Helen, trendy Tory grande dame, in tears without hope of "military" cast or costumes. Tim, dog-breeding ex-army captain, finds damsel in distress and takes charge. With a display of twitching Montgomeryesque paranoia he turns the pageant into a battle: the horse may be a property borrowed from the Pendon Players, but Tim's gun is for real. In their colourful historic costumes the Rightist soldiers play out variations of the dropped-trousers routine demanded of English farce, the Leftists plot underhandedly and violence comes into its own. There is plenty of noise, much rushing about—but the result is sadly ineffectual.

It is an admirable display of technical virtuosity on Alan Ayckbourn's part both as author and director, a highly organized interplay of theatrical, social and military clichés. One by one the laughs are prepared for and duly collected. The minefield is carefully laid, trip wires set in place, touchpapers lit, fuses burn, the explosions of laughter echo round the theatre.

Perhaps it is a mite too obvious: the joinery shows and the idea is spread thinly. No matter, Ayckbourn knows what audiences like, how little they need be given to be duly grateful for a laugh, and will be raking in the easy money for months to come. But is it worth it?

Ten Times Table provides a textbook example in farcical construction. It is passably well acted. It makes you laugh. Why ask for more? Because more could surely have been made of it. Ayckbourn settled for what he knew would work quickly and expediently—paint and pasteboard being easier to produce than people. Since he can do this so cleverly, should he not develop his gifts? Or perhaps he is only a conjuror and we should not ask him to be a real magician.

Promoting youth music

Robin Maconie

Promoting Youth Music is the title of a one-day conference to be held in conjunction with the 1978 National Festival of Music for Youth, on Friday July 14, in the Ashcroft Theatre, Fairfield Halls, Croydon, where the Festival itself is celebrated.

The idea for a conference arose from the belief that the excellent and original teaching manifested in Festival performances over the years deserved wider discussion and public recognition. This exciting development in individual initiatives and musical quality and variety, away from traditional competition and curricular standards, is a peculiarly British phenomenon, and European organizations are already expressing an intention to participate. The conference is being organized by Music in Education, which, under a new editorial [illegible] with present trends.

The conference will be primarily concerned with sharing ideas and information about a number of the more important areas of innovation in the youth music field. There will be three main discussions: the first, "Improving Communications", to do with significant advances in administration and the media; the second, "Materials and Methods", concerned mainly with initiatives and innovations by individual teachers and schools; and finally "After Gulbenkian", which will examine some of the implications of the recently published Gulbenkian Report on the training of young musicians.

Speakers will include representatives from the BBC, British Council, United Kingdom Council of Music Education, Musicians' Union, university and local government, the record industry, youth concert promotion, and teachers in all sectors of education. The growing integration of music and other studies can be demonstrated from a body of teaching experience encompassing Renaissance studies for infants, Jacobean studies for juniors, making musical instruments, composing and performing new music with secondary pupils of mixed ability, to involving music, dance, art, and needlework departments in a detailed reconstruction of Milhaud's ballet La Création du Monde, complete with original Léger-designed sets and costumes, involving an entire school.

Promoting youth music is a new, and, some would say, dangerous concept. But it signifies something positive and professional in an area of activity traditionally treated by those in authority as amateur or [illegible] were years of material [illegible] and expansion; in the seventies, with the country facing economic restrictions, the emphasis has shifted from quantity to quality, with more graduates moving into school and youth music. That application of new standards of achievement has brought this music to its present high level. Promoting it is a natural recognition of that achievement. The alternative, exploitation, is something we could well do without.

As accommodation in the Ashcroft Theatre is limited, admission to the conference will be by subscription only, at a charge of £7.00 per session, or £5.00 for the day, also giving admission to the three-day National Festival of Music for Youth. Applications to: "Promoting Youth Music", Music in Education, 4 Little Essex Street, London WC2R 3LF (01-836 [illegible] ext. 211).

New beginnings

Rosemary Hartill

Ballet Rambert opens its spring tour next week at Poole with a small programme that offers just under half of the repertoire so successfully give at the packed out season at Sadlers Wells in March.

It includes the passionately intense, and now strengthened, Cruel Garden (the full-length ballet based on Lorca's life and work), Christopher Bruce's powerful Black Angels, and an ill-assorted selection of three new ballets—Nuthouse Stomp, Leigh Warren's pleasantly cheerful, undemanding gum-chewing pastiche of the Jazz Age, Zoltan Imre's Laocoon which with its easy jokes manages to diminish a tragic legend into a tasteless sketch on bondage, and Glen Tetley's Praeludium.

Praeludium is one of those rare, rich works which suggests new ideas and feelings each performance. The [illegible] paradoxes that Eliot explored in words in the Four Quartets:

> What we call the beginning is > often the end
> And to make an end is to make a > beginning.
> The end is where we start from.

Around two central earthbound figures—a man dressed in the purple of repentance and mourning, a woman in the red of guilt, life and fire—six other dancers, in white, suggest both the unknown memory and the forgotten promise of a more loving, stronger, free humanity. Following the score of early Webern chamber music, the ballet quietly gathers together the past and future, romanticism and realism, modern and classical styles until finally the ballet closes as it began in Eliot's "condition of extreme simplicity".

Tetley chose Nadine Baylis as his designer for Praeludium. At 36, she is one of the world's leading dance designers; the season at Sadlers Wells shows what an immense and significant contribution she makes to the work of the Rambert. She studied first at the Central School of art and Design under Ralph Koltai, later working with him at the RSC. In 1966 Norman Morrice invited her to design a ballet for the Rambert. She says now it was like "a release, like waking up one morning as a child and suddenly discovering I could speak a new language".

She usually discusses with the choreographer his ideas for the ballet before he actually begins work, and then, after the first two or three days of rehearsal, starts to sit in on the making of the ballet, watching the dance ideas emerge and develop. Gradually, she builds up a model of the stage and design to get a three-dimensional impression of how the ideas will project in the theatre. At this point she may scrap the design altogether. On returning to watch a rehearsal of Praeludium, for instance, she realized that horizontal lines were breaking the mood and line of the upward lifting movement of so much of the choreography. The finished design uses light-reflecting metal tubes growing upwards from a convoluted base.

"What I admire most about Nadine's work", says Tetley, "is its extreme simplicity. She illumines rather than obscures the choreography." Nadine Baylis herself puts it another way. Her main concern, she says, is "not to ruin the choreography".

Dates: Poole, April 25-29; Nottingham, May 2-6; Aberystwyth, May 9-13; Liverpool, May 16-20; Edinburgh, May 23-27; Bath, June 2.

Incredibility

D. J. Hart

Crime and Punishment is surely [illegible] momentous thing to attempt on the stage—and the Manchester Royal Exchange company never came any where near pulling it off. Paul Bailey's adaptation of the novel was no more than a pedantic précis and Michael Elliott directed it piecemeal, scene by truncated scene, ploughing his circular arena and reaping nothing.

Anyone who saw Dostoievsky's short story, The Dream of a Ridiculous Man, a few years ago, in the touring production by Pip Simmons, will know what can happen when a director is inspired by the novelist and then moves on to create his own original theatrical work. What Elliot is doing is making a presentation of epic drama, asking the big questions, playing at existentialist [illegible] and finishing up with something that is schmaltzy, sentimental and stale, all wind.

Was Tom Courtenay encouraged as Raskolnikov, to shout so much, show no contrasts of mood, or was he just given his head? Asked to go bang, bang, bang around the mini-sets from one big emotional moment to the next the odds were against him, but there was no subtlety in his performance, no sense of the ambivalence of his inner [illegible]

Other characterizations were allowed to slip even farther [illegible] extrovert bathos, notably Eliza[illegible] but a few [illegible] Romilly's as Sonia, but it might be [illegible] gested how else it might be [illegible] As Porfiry Petrovitch, the police chief, Leo McKern was magnificent, so was Michael Poole playing [illegible] was left of the character of [illegible] suitor, Pyotry Luzhin. And if [illegible] style has any credibility at all [illegible] was some of the minor characters, especially Maureen Morris as the servant, Nastasya, who also [illegible] seem so.

Radio

Scientific ocean

Frederick Aicken

Next term BBC radio will launch Introducing Science. It is for that age-range (nine-12) in which an explorative introduction to science is both crucial and often, because so many teachers (humbly but erroneously) feel inadequate, non-existent.

Many of those teachers who have already taken the plunge discover, to their surprise, that the subject is not as formidable as they had imagined. Within this age-range there is less emphasis on technical precision, factual detail and theoretical complexity than later, deeper treatments will demand. But the point is that even young children can learn to schematize their growing experience of the world around them in a rudimentary scientific method—careful observation, formulation of explanatory hypotheses and the devising of experiments to eliminate unsatisfactory hypotheses. For those teachers who are still shivering on the brink of this scientific ocean the new series will provide both a lifebelt and a map.

The programmes are designed to be flexible. They contain a high proportion of direct teaching so that they can be used, more or less, as they emerge as the core of class teaching; but for older children they can be jumping-off points for individual investigation. They do not follow a rigid pattern; they can be dipped into in a way which depends on the experience of the class or the enthusiasm of the teacher.

They deal with familiar topics—air, water and sound. They involve class activity before, after and, occasionally, during a programme. They try to be light-hearted in their approach; the dramatis personae includes such characters as Miss Molly Cule. Above all, and it is refreshing to see this in a subject which is so often dealt with prosaically, they aim to catch the juvenile imagination.

I recently watched the programme on air being "piloted" with a group of 10-year-olds. A great deal of work had been packed into it and, because of various demands on time, the teacher had arranged for it to run without a break. Predictably there were moments when the children lost interest, either because they were being told facts instead of being invited to discover them or, simply, because the accumulation of information and ideas was too great.

Nevertheless, subsequent discussion showed that facts had been retained and interest stimulated. Written reactions were, on the whole, enthusiastic, apart from one remark which suggested that the programme was boring to one who already knew all the facts. But this was not so much a criticism of the programme (even when played uninterrupted) as of a view of science teaching which is not confined to children.

The success of this lesson was made possible by much careful preparation by the teacher. He not only supplied blackboard diagrams, duplicated information and demonstration experiments but ensured that they synchronized with the programme and that they actually worked. How many teachers are trained, either by college or by their own common sense, to use broadcast material instead of allowing it to take over their classes?

It cannot be too often emphasized that today's educational broadcasts, often apparently overloaded and impersonal, can only come to recognizable classroom life if they are allowed to expand within the listener's experience by careful preplanning. A programme like Air could be worse than useless if it were listened to live without the necessary preparation. But recorded on cheap audio-cassettes it could be more valuable, in the developing of scientific imagination, than any other aid I can think of, not excluding books.

The essential factor, as always, is the teacher and his willingness to make good use of the pause switch (or, as it might be called in this context, the imagination switch), especially when clues have been provided and solutions are about to be given. The series generally can be equally useful to the novice teacher of science by giving him the opportunity to experiment with different approaches and to develop individual ideas at the same time as he is learning with his pupils.

There is no pupil's pamphlet for this series but the teacher's notes contain, for each programme, a separate A4 sheet of diagrams which can be duplicated or reproduced on a blackboard. The notes also have suggestions for a variety of follow-up work. The series, spanning autumn and spring terms and including topical and relevant historical programmes, will start on Wednesday, September 20 (11.20 to 11.40, Radio 4).

Clues to character

Gene Deitch: The Picture Book Animated
16mm, Colour, sound, 25 mins.
Weston Woods, 14 Friday St., Henley-on-Thames, Oxon.

Gene Deitch has directed some of the most impressive animated children's films. In his work for Weston Woods he has translated to film such noted books as The Beast of Monsieur Racine, A Story—A Story, Patrick and the nigh impossible Where The Wild Things Are.

As Weston Woods have paid tribute to various children's authors and artists—Maurice Sendak, Ezra Jack Keats, Shepherd and Milne—with films about their work, so it is fitting that Gene Deitch should similarly be acknowledged.

From his home in Prague, Deitch discusses the problems which face the animator and shows his work in progress. His effusively amiable manner is, at first, distracting, but his skill is immense, his enthusiasm infectious and the behind-the-scenes view of the work involved in the creation of the seemingly simple remarkable.

Sendak's Wild Things posed extraordinary problems (the film took four years to make) and the strange dance element of the illustrations called for a totally original movement, resulting in the development of a system of over-lapping, multiple dissolves to give the sluggish, dreamlike quality the author had envisaged. Gail Haley appears in the film demonsrtating the African movements which she tried to portray in A Story—A Story.

The soundtrack is given careful consideration. Gail Haley's book was problematic in that Prague does not boast a legion of traditional African musicians. But it does have a fine ethnographic museum which provided the necessary instruments and a musicologist capable of locating musicians who could play them. In the book Changes, Changes everything is made of wood and so only musical instruments, some of them especially created, were used.

Sendak wanted to go further than his book and to point at the distance between Max and his parents as the reason for the child's being so horrid. Slightly alienating household noises—a baby crying, a car driving off, muffled music from an adult party, a door being slammed—were mixed together, slowed down and distorted to give the familiarity and estrangement of the dream.

The film does not concentrate only on inspiration. We see the basic work of preparation of storyboards and commentaries, the group of artists who execute the drawings, editing sequences and gain an impression of the vast amount of team work which goes into making these films. Hard graft apart, the over-riding impression is one of immense interest, care and brilliance maintained throughout the plodding execution of ideas. One wishes that more children's materials were being produced by such people.

Food for thought

Food—A Cause for Your Concern
16mm colour
Free loan from Guild Sound and Vision, 85-129 Oundle Road, Peterborough PE2 9PY
Produced and sponsored by the National Dairy Council, John Prince's Street, London W1M 0AP

Nobody could deny that there is a lot of junk food about, or that children eat it, or that eating patterns formed in childhood are extraordinarily difficult to break. What can we do to change this regrettable situation? The Milk Marketing Board suggests that adults—teachers, parents, playgroup leaders—watch its new film and then introduce nutrition education into every child's life.

Food—A Cause for your Concern presents the facts clearly and without emotion. We learn without too much surprise that many children do not get breakfast, that most prefer crisps and sweets to apples or vegetables, that in the West malnutrition—deficiencies caused by diet—leads to osteoarthritis, coronaries and tooth decay. Jack Pizzey interviews children and experts to establish this and oJhn Yudkin, the first ever professor of nutrition, does some persuasive talking.

When we come to the solution, we are on shakier ground. The film is perhaps naturally biased towards dairy products, there is a lot of talk about eggs and very little about vegetables. However, ways of explaining food balances to very young children, through puppets and pictures, and to older pupils through science, are demonstrated very well.

In this curious society where the tax from cigarettes probably contributes massively to the National Health Service and the upkeep of cancer wards, the makers of useless food cannot be expected to have consciences. But we can, and this film could have a positive contribution to make.

Briefings

Radio and tv

FE and general interest

The South Bank Show. (Saturday, 22.15 ITV)
Entirely devoted to an interview with Harold Pinter.

Teaching Music. (Tuesday, 19.00 Radio 3)
How do you keep young musicians interested during group lessons? Is there a difference between teaching adult and child beginners?

The Golden Age of Spain. (Wednesday, 19.00 Radio 3)
In "Painting" the work of Velasquez, El Greco, Murillo, Zuburan and Ribera is discussed.

Looking at Claudius. (Friday, 18.30 Radio 3)
As a prelude to the next showing of "I Claudius" (June 8) Sheridan Morley discusses "Claudius on television" with Sian Phillips, Robert Erskine, Derek Jacobi and Herbert Wise.

For schools

Merry-Go-Round. (Monday, 10.00 Thursday, 9.42 BBC1)
"It couldn't happen to me . . ." tells the story of a child's recovery from a road accident.

Springboard. (Monday, 11.20 VHF4)
Seven to nine-year-olds hear how the rose was adopted by the Dukes of York and Lancaster as their sign.

Merry-Go-Round; Sex Education (Tuesday, 10.00 Friday, 10.00 BBC1)
A short series of three programmes for eight to 10-year-olds which focus on the development, birth and growth of a young baby.

Music Round. (Tuesday, 10.21 ITV)
"Make Your Own Music" aims to introduce 10-year-olds to unconventional music sounds and methods of notation.

Over to You. (Tuesday, 11.39 ITV)
Eight to 12-year-olds find themselves on Everest, in a gallery of moving sculpture, in a gymnasium and finally in a poetry laboratory—all to stimulate their written and oral creativity.

History in Focus. (Tuesday, 14.20 VHF4)
Fourteen to 17-year-olds examine the effect of industrial pollution on life in Tokyo.

Scan. (Thursday, 10.30 BBC 1)
A unit called "Ourselves and Others" for 11 to 13 year-olds begins with three sequences on relationships and responsibilities at school, at home and at the shops.

London: the making of a city. (Thursday, 11.39 ITV)
Aimed at a wide range of secondary and middle school pupils, these programmes trace the development of London by following different walks

Learning about Life. (Thursday, 14.40 VHF4)
"Learning to be parents" introduces 14 to 16 year-olds to the realities of being a parent.

Images from a computer

Carl Slevin reports on the British Universities' Film Council's annual conference

ational technology covers an mely broad spectrum from licated electronic machinery to simplest of aids. It also involves hole series of administrative tures required to make this ment and its products available for use. This range was one e main themes at British University's Film Council's annual conference held in Cardiff on April e section of the conference, puters for Image Making" concerned with the use of comers to generate and display ical representations of phena which are too complex to be uately demonstrated or economically produced by other means. example the structure of the oglobin molecule took years to e and won a Nobel Prize for discoverers. But, even once ined, this knowledge was remely difficult for other earch workers, let alone dents to grasp. Diagrams successfully represent such ucture in three dimensions and physical models surmount this problem, they can only portray one stage of the molecule at a time. Rather than a single structure, the molecule is like sets of jigsaw pieces which can be clicked into different pictures depending on the kind of motion taking place inside it.

Dr David Clark, of the University of London's audio-visual aids centre, presented a computer generated film model of the molecule based on the medical work of Professor E. R. Huehns of University College which gives immediate access to a comprehensive picture. The model is dynamic, three dimensional (with the aid of polarized spectacles), and can be built up or broken down bit by bit or turned to any angle on the command by the user.

Another example of the part pictures are playing in education was described by Diana Laurillard of the University of Surrey who studied their use in undergraduate science as part of the Department of Education's National Development Programme in Computer Assisted Learning between 1974 and 1977. The project produced 30 packages of materials on such topics as atomic orbitals, satellite trajectories and Schroedinger's Equation. Although mostly in the physical sciences, some packages were produced in social science—for example, one on price elasticity. The essential point about using a computer for such cases is that it allows the user to test quickly and easily guesses about what would happen if one or more variables were changed.

In the case of satellite trajectories the user could dial up a picture of the path of a satellite orbiting the earth and then change its velocity to check the effects. This could be done by hand or by calculator; but the computer does it at the touch of a button and shows the result on a screen without the need for long winded computations.

This improves not merely visual appreciation of the phenomenon but also relational understanding. The package can be designed so as to require students to participate by experimenting with, reasoning about, or interpreting the results before moving on to the next stage.

At the other end of the educational technology spectrum, Professor R. C. MacLean described how the Centre for Educational Practice, at the University of Strathclyde, of which he is head, came into being. The central component was an audio-visual unit which operated as a service department for the university catering for its needs in film, television, tapes and graphics. The addition of three academics, including Professor MacLean, to form the CEP, has allowed much greater use to be made of existing facilities. The centre continues to undertake the service activities of the former audio-visual centre and in addition carries out research, undertakes inservice training for recently appointed lecturers and runs an undergraduate course in communication. It also provides a study guidance service for students based on a series of video tapes on recurrent problems such as note taking, essay writing, and timetabling which are available for use in the centre when required. These tapes are now in use in a dozen or so other institutions.

Some of the contrasts between the British and French educational systems were highlighted by Robert Lefranc, who is director of the audio-visual centre of the Ecole Normale Supérieure of St Cloud, one of the BUFC's overseas members. The centre is not concerned with the production of audio visual material for distribution but with research and development of pilot schemes and prototypes. Apart from this, it takes 50 or so students a year for training in educational technology.

The upheavals of 1968 presented the centre with a range of new problems. The number of university students was greatly increased although the grandes écoles consolidated their position at the peak of higher education, creaming off the best candidates. With the suspicion that as the number increased, the average quality of students and staff was declining, the centre applied itself to developing material which would assist the transition.

The French system relies on such specialist institutions with comparatively massive facilities in equipment and staff, while the British is decentralized apart from bodies like BUFC which bring them together from time to time.
